Bugden and another v Ministry of Defence and others

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

c LORD DENNING MR, EDMUND DAVIES AND STEPHENSON LJJ
8th OCTOBER 1971

d Writ – Extension of validity – Application – Order for renewal made in absence of application – Validity of order – Application for leave to serve concurrent writ out of jurisdiction – Good and sufficient cause for renewal but no application made – Whether master having power to make order for renewal – RSC Ord 6, r 8 (2).

e The plaintiffs were injured in a motor accident which occurred on 9th October 1966 when the car in which they were passengers came into collision with an army vehicle. They claimed damages against the Ministry of Defence and the army driver, and against their own driver, B. Negotiations went ahead for a settlement of the claim but took some time because there were difficult medical questions to be solved. Accordingly a writ was not issued until 23rd September 1969, i.e. just before the expiry of the three year limitation period. Thereafter the writ was not served as the medical position remained uncertain. However, on 7th September 1970 the plaintiffs' solicitors decided to serve the writ before it expired. B was then in Scotland and accordingly they applied to the master for leave to issue a concurrent writ against f B for service on him in Scotland. The master gave leave and, in view of the time factor but without any application being made to him, also added: 'liberty to renew for three months'. The solicitors accordingly drew up the order containing the liberty to renew for three months and eventually served the writ on B in December 1970. B's solicitors, on behalf of his insurers, thereupon applied to set aside the service of the writ contending that the master had no jurisdiction to make the order for renewal since no application for extension had been made as required by RSC g Ord 6, r 8 (2)^a.

h Held (Edmund Davies LJ dissenting) – Had an application been duly made to the master there would have been good cause for renewing the writ; the lack of an application was a mere irregularity which did not render the order for renewal a nullity and accordingly the order should stand (see p 3 h, p 4 b and p 5 c and f, post).

Notes For time for service and renewal of writ, see 30 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 303, para 558, and for cases on the subject, see 50 Digest (Repl) 291-293, 328-346.

Interlocutory appeal

This was an interlocutory appeal by the plaintiffs, Jacqueline Ann Bugden and Kevin Bugden (an infant suing by his mother and next friend), against the order of Caulfield J, made on 10th June 1971, that the service on the third defendant, Roy Ambrose Bugden, of the writ of summons in an action by the plaintiffs against the Ministry of Defence, the first defendants, Joseph Patterson, the second defendant, and the third defendant, be set aside and that the appeal against the order of Master Bickford Smith made on 3rd February 1971 be allowed. By his decision Master Bickford Smith refused to order that the writ of summons be set aside or that the order of Master Elton made on 10th September 1970 giving leave to the plaintiffs to issue a concurrent writ against the third defendant, and to have liberty to renew for three months, be set aside. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

R N Titheridge for the plaintiffs.

M J Turner for the third defendant.

Philip Otton for the first and second defendants.

LORD DENNING MR. On 9th October 1966 there was an accident on a road in the North Riding. Mr and Mrs Bugden, with their eight month old child, were in a car driven by Mr Bugden, who is in the army; it came into collision with a personnel carrier of the Ministry of Defence, driven by a service driver. There was a collision in the middle of the road. Mrs Bugden and the baby were injured. They made a claim against the Ministry of Defence and their driver, and also against Mr Bugden himself. We all know that the passengers in a car have an unanswerable claim for damages against one or other, or both, drivers. The Ministry of Defence appointed their claims commission to act for them. Mr Bugden was represented by his insurance company. These two have a sharing agreement between themselves, whereby they arrange to apportion responsibility between one another. In this case they arranged that negotiations for both should be conducted by the claims commission. On 13th December 1967 the solicitors for the plaintiffs wrote to the insurance company:

‘... Will you please confirm therefore that the passenger claims may be dealt with under the terms of the third party sharing agreement which we believe operates between yourselves and the Ministry of Defence.’

The insurers wrote back on 2nd January 1968:

‘We confirm that any claim made will be dealt with under the terms of our Third Party Sharing agreement with the Claims Commission who we understand from recent correspondence are dealing with the matter...’

Negotiations went ahead. They took some time because there were some difficult medical questions to be solved. It appears that the child developed hydrocephalus—that is, his head got much bigger than normal. He also suffered from some drying up beneath the skin. It was suggested that these troubles might be due to the accident. It was wise to defer a settlement until the medical situation could be resolved. On this account a writ was not issued until 23rd September 1969. That is just before the three years expired. No one can be blamed for that. It was not served at that time. That was fair enough. The medical position was still uncertain. Nearly another year went by. On 7th September 1970 the plaintiffs’ solicitors thought to themselves, very properly: ‘We will have to serve this writ in the next fortnight; otherwise it will lose its validity at the end of a year’. They found out that Mr Bugden, a serving soldier, was in Scotland. The writ would have to be served on him out of the jurisdiction. So they applied to Master Elton for leave to issue a concurrent writ against Mr Bugden for service on him in Scotland—in Edinburgh. They made this application for the writ on 7th September. The year would expire on 23rd a September 1970. Master Elton not only gave leave to issue the concurrent writ, but, out of the goodness of his heart, thinking it would help, he also added (without any application made to him) 'liberty to renew for three months'. The solicitors for the plaintiffs thought that Master Elton must know the practice. He would not have added those words unless it could be done. So they drew up the order containing the liberty to renew for three months. They accepted the benefit which

b the master gave them. They did not rush round so as to serve the writ within the year. They waited for the best part of the three months. They then served the writ in December 1970.

The Ministry of Defence and their driver took no exception to the renewal of the writ. They entered an unconditional appearance. That was the fair thing to do. It was what we should expect the Treasury Solicitor to do. But not so the insurers.
c They entered a conditional appearance. They said this writ ought not to have been renewed. They applied to set aside the renewal so that the action would not proceed. (Outwardly they were acting for Mr Bugden, but in truth they were acting on their own account. Mr Bugden would not mind the action going on; but the insurers did.) The application came before Master Bickford Smith on 3rd February 1971. Master Bickford Smith asked himself what he would have done in d Master Elton's place if an application had been made at that time to him. He answered it in this way:

'I do not feel very much doubt about it. The claims are passenger claims, there is no issue on liability, there is a difficult medical position and negotiations were proceeding. I would have renewed the writ.'

e Having formed that view, he held that there was good cause for the renewal, and he refused to set it aside. The insurers appealed to Caulfield J. He took an equally strong view the other way. He said:

'Master Elton of his own motion renewed the writ for a three-months period. There was no material before him to enable him to do so.'

f The judge held that the writ ought not to have been renewed. He set it aside. If he is right, the insurers escape altogether. The plaintiffs appeal to this court. RSC Ord 6, r 8 (2) provides:

'Where a writ has not been served on a defendant, the Court may by order
g extend the validity of the writ from time to time for such period, not exceeding twelve months at any one time, beginning with the day next following that on which it would otherwise expire, as may be specified in the order, if an application for extension is made to the Court before that day or such later day (if any) as the Court may allow.'

h That rule does not say anything about good cause. But the courts have said from time to time—and the latest case is *Jones v Jones*¹—that in the ordinary way a writ should not be renewed unless good cause is shown.

The first question I ask myself is this: suppose that an application has been duly made to Master Elton for renewal—I know it was not—was there good cause for renewing the writ? That I would answer in the same way as Master Bickford Smith. There were only 12 days to go before the writ was due to expire. There might be difficulty in serving it on Mr Bugden in that time. He might have been sent on j service overseas. He might be somewhere where it was difficult to get hold of him. An extension for three months would not prejudice the defendants at all, especially as it was a difficult case where there were difficult medical questions to be solved, and there were negotiations for a settlement. I would have thought that there was good cause for renewal.

But then it is said that Master Elton acted on his own initiative. There was no application before him for renewal—there was no affidavit before him to support it—he ought not to have granted leave without being asked. It is suggested that that makes his order bad—that it was a nullity, that the plaintiffs' solicitors should have known this, and that they should not have accepted the gift he offered them. I cannot accept this suggestion in the least. The lack of an application was a mere irregularity. It does not render the order a nullity. It would, indeed, be a sorry thing if the plaintiffs were to suffer because of a helpful step taken by the master.

I am afraid I cannot agree with Caulfield J. I would allow the appeal and let the renewal stand.

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. If personal preference were permitted to prevail in performing one's judicial duties, I should gladly have agreed with the judgment just delivered by Lord Denning MR, but regretfully I do not find myself able to do that. The provision in relation to the renewal of writs is to be found in RSC Ord 6, r 8 (2), and I quote the relevant part:

'Where a writ has not been served on a defendant, the Court may by order extend the validity of the writ from time to time for such period . . . as may be specified in the order, if an application for extension is made to the Court before that day or such later day (if any) as the Court may allow.'

That rule varies in its wording from previous provisions dealing with the renewal of writs, but the fact remains that the court requires good and sufficient cause for renewal to be shown. Furthermore, the settled practice is that such an application, being made ex parte, and I quote from *The Supreme Court Practice 1970*²:

' . . . must be supported by an affidavit showing all the circumstances relied upon, including the date of issue of the original writ, and if it has already been renewed, the date of the last renewal, and a full explanation of why the writ has not already been served.'

In the present case it is quite clear that this settled practice was not observed.

As I see it, the test is not whether Master Elton could have made an order had good cause been shown, for no application was made. Therefore no good cause for making the order which he in fact made was ever shown. In those circumstances, I do not for my part think that Master Elton had power of his own volition to make the order extending the time which no one had asked him to make, and certainly no one had proceeded to attempt to show a good cause for it being made at all. At one stage it was submitted by counsel for the plaintiffs that, even if at the time of the limited application to Master Elton no good cause existed, nevertheless this court is entitled to have regard to the fact that Master Elton (although uninvited) made the order, and accordingly to say that Master Bickford Smith was in consequence justified in holding that good cause for granting an extension had thereby been created. I do not think that counsel for the plaintiffs persisted in that original submission, and in any event he must allow me to say that I do not regard it as well founded.

If I am right in thinking that Master Elton in the circumstances which prevailed when he heard the plaintiffs' application had, on the material before him and in the absence of any application, no power to make the order he in fact made, it seems to me to follow that it was immaterial that Master Bickford Smith expressed the view that the various topics referred to in his short but helpful note of judgment amounted to 'good cause' within the meaning of the reported cases. For my part I think, though with some diffidence, that the test must be whether Master Elton had any

a power to make the order he made. My regret in differing from Lord Denning MR naturally springs not only from my reluctance so to do, but also from the fact that I accept that, had the various points which Master Bickford Smith dwelt on been the subject-matter of an application for the renewal to Master Elton, they might well be regarded as amounting to 'good cause'. But that, for the reasons I have stated, does not appear to me to be the relevant test in the circumstances of this case. I accordingly would be for upholding the decision of the learned judge and dismissing this appeal.

c STEPHENSON LJ. I feel the force of counsel for the third defendant's submission that Master Elton's order was made without good cause or sufficient reason and cannot therefore be supported, particularly as his submission was based on the decision of Chapman J in *Stevens v Services Window & General Cleaning Co Ltd*³ and has been accepted by the judge and by Edmund Davies LJ. But there were in existence at the time when Master Elton made his order grounds which I regard as good and sufficient for renewing the writ. Those are the grounds which commended themselves to Master Bickford Smith reinforced by the further ground relied on by counsel for the plaintiffs, which it is safe to assume was relied on by Master Elton, that the third defendant was in Scotland and there were about 12 days in which to serve him.

d In my judgment, the plaintiffs' solicitors would have been acting reasonably if they had applied to Master Elton to renew the writ when he renewed it and they cannot be said to have acted unreasonably in accepting his gratuitous benevolence in renewing it without their asking for it. The first and second defendants regarded it as a reasonable order to make, and I am by no means satisfied that the third defendant's solicitors, acting for his insurers in the circumstances of which we have been told, would have taken a different view if they had been asked in advance to concur in the making of it.

e For the reasons given by Lord Denning MR, I am glad to be able to allow this appeal in the very special circumstances of this case, and without, as I think, any injustice to the third defendant or his insurers, to remove the risk that the plaintiffs will fail altogether if they fail to prove any liability on the part of the first and second defendants.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, BRIDGE AND SHAW JJ

8th OCTOBER 1971

Commonwealth immigrant – Admission – Refusal of admission – Notice of refusal – Delivery of notice to immigrant – Notice delivered by immigration officer to immigrant's legal adviser at airport – Immigrant illiterate and having no knowledge of English – Immigrant in another part of airport at time notice delivered – Whether necessary that notice should be delivered by hand to immigrant personally – Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962, Sch 1, para 2 (1). b

B, a Pakistani citizen who was illiterate and had no knowledge of English, arrived at Manchester airport on 14th September 1971. She alleged that she was going to join her husband who was resident in England. She was seen by an immigration officer at 14.15 hours on that day. She handed him a passport which had what purported to be an entry certificate to the UK granted to her by the authorities in Lahore. The certificate appeared to the officer to be a forgery. While enquiries were being made the immigration officer served B with a notice under para 1 (2) of Sch 1^a to the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962 requiring her to submit to a further examination. The interview was suspended at 14.30 hours. Thereafter the immigration officer, through an interpreter, examined B from 18.00 hours to 19.15 hours, and again for a third time from 20.30 hours to 21.00 hours. The investigation was suspended until the following day, 15th September, to enable the immigration authorities to get some Telex information from Lahore. When received this information confirmed the immigration officer's suspicions that the certificate was a forgery and, at 13.30 hours on 15th September, it was decided to refuse B entry into the UK. At that time she was in another part of the airport and in her absence the appropriate notice of refusal under para 2 (1) of Sch 1^b to the 1962 Act was served on her solicitor who raised no objection. B applied for an order of certiorari to quash the decision of the immigration authorities contending (i) that the requirements of para 2 (1) of Sch 1 had not been complied with, in that the notice of refusal had not been handed to her in person; (ii) that as the investigations involved a series of interviews, the initial notice under para 1 (2) of Sch 1^a should have been renewed at the close of each interview; and (iii) that as there was an interval of more than 12 hours between the end of the third interview at 21.00 hours on 14th September and the notification of refusal at 13.30 hours on 15th September the notice of refusal was invalid as given out of time under para 2 (3) of Sch 1^c. c

Held – The application would be refused for the following reasons—

(i) although the purpose of para 2 of Sch 1 was to ensure that the notice should be delivered to the immigrant by hand and not sent through the post or in any other form of communication, since B was illiterate and quite incapable of dealing with her affairs at all, there was nothing wrong in handing the notice to someone authorised by her to receive it; it was an inevitable inference that the legal adviser who was representing her and handling the whole affair on her behalf should be regarded as a person having authority to receive the notice (see p 8 j to p 9 b and p 10 a, post). h

(ii) although the investigation took place in a series of interviews it was not necessary that the notice under Sch 1, para 1 (2), requiring the immigrant to submit to further examination should be renewed in a further notice of that kind at the close of each j

- a section of the interview; the only function of the notice under Sch 1, para 1 (2), was to provide for the contingency that the examination could not be completed within the time specified in that paragraph; since the examination had in any event been completed within that time no situation ever arose in which the notices under para 1 (2) would have had any relevance to all (see p 9 d and e and p 10 a, post);
- b (iii) as the examination of the applicant continued right up to and including the time when refusal was given at 13.30 hours on 15th September the refusal was not given out of time under the terms of para 2 (3) of Sch 1 (see p 9 h and j and p 10 a, post).

Motion for certiorari

- d This was an application by way of motion on behalf of Insah Begum for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash a decision made on 15th September 1971 by an immigration officer at Manchester airport whereby he refused her admission to the United Kingdom. Her grounds for the application were, inter alia, (i) that the notice of refusal made under para 2 of Sch 1 to the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962 was invalid because the immigration officer handed the notice to the applicant's solicitor and not to the applicant herself; (ii) that the initial notice under para 1 (2) of Sch 1 to the 1962 Act for her to submit to a further examination should have been renewed at the close of each section of the interview, and (iii) that the notice of refusal
- e was invalid as given out of time under para 2 (3) of Sch 1 to the 1962 Act. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

G S Khan for the applicant.

Gordon Slynn for the chief immigration officer.

- f LORD WIDGERY CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of the applicant, Insah Begum, for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash a decision made by Her Majesty's immigration officer at Manchester airport on 15th September 1971 whereby admission to this country was refused to the applicant. The notice of motion asks for other relief, which request is not pursued before us, and it also raises a number of grounds which counsel for the applicant has found it impossible
- g to proceed on. The matter therefore lies before us in a relatively small compass.

- h The applicant arrived at Manchester airport from Pakistan on 14th September 1971. She held herself out as a married woman, the wife of a person already resident in this country, one Arif Hussain, using a passport which had in effect what purported to be an entry certificate into this country granted to her by the authorities in Lahore. She was seen by an immigration officer at 14.15 hours on 14th September and, to the eye of the immigration officer, the entry certificate appeared to be a forgery. He appreciated that this would involve considerable enquiries, and might involve the expenditure of some time, and he immediately served her with a notice under para 1 (2) of Sch 1 to the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962, which in its original form provided:

- i 'A person shall not be required to submit to examination under this paragraph after the expiration of the period of twenty-four hours from the time when he lands in the United Kingdom unless, upon being examined within that period, he is required in writing by an immigration officer to submit to further examination.'

The period of 24 hours has since been amended to 28 days¹, and the purpose of the provision both in its original and amended form, quite evidently is that unless proceedings can be completed within that limit of time, the onus is thrown on the immigration officer of serving a notice requiring the would-be immigrant to submit to further examination. a

In perhaps an excess of caution, such a notice was served really as soon as the difficulties in this case became apparent. The interview beginning at 14.15 hours was suspended at 14.30 hours, but later in the same day further enquiries took place between the immigration officer and the applicant through an interpreter. b The period of that examination was from 18.00 hours until 19.15 hours. I might have said that the applicant is illiterate and had no knowledge of the English language, and at an early stage her solicitor and later her counsel were brought to the airport to assist her and the enquiry.

The second interview, if that is the right word, having finished at 19.15 hours, there was a further interview between 20.30 and 21.00 hours, and the circumstances in which that interview terminated are described by Mr David Ian Fuller, one of the immigration officers concerned, in his affidavit at para 34. Speaking of this last interview he states: c

‘At the conclusion of this interview which was finished at about 21.00 hours I told Mr. Anwar Salamat Ali and the applicant through Mr. Kumar that I considered that the entry certificate was a forgery. I also told them that I was not satisfied as to the authenticity of the marriage. I further told them that I was expecting a reply to a Telex that had been sent to the Entry Certificate Officer at Lahore about the entry certificate and that no decision would be taken to admit or to refuse to admit the applicant until this had been received.’ d

Accordingly, at 21.00 hours on 14th September the investigation was suspended until the following day when the Telex from Lahore was received, and since the terms of the Telex confirmed the suspicions of the immigration officer that the entry certificate was a forgery, they decided to refuse entry to the applicant at 13.30 hours on 15th September. Thereupon the appropriate notice under para 2 of Sch 1 of the 1962 Act was prepared, and it was handed by the officers to Mr Bookin, who was the applicant's solicitor, and who was present at the time. Just to complete the picture at this point the applicant herself was not present, although somewhere within the airport confines. Present at the moment when the certificate of refusal was issued were the immigration officers, the solicitor to the applicant and her counsel. e

Schedule 1, para 2 (1), is in these terms: f

‘The power of an immigration officer under section two of this Act to refuse admission into the United Kingdom or to admit into the United Kingdom subject to conditions shall be exercised by notice in writing; and subject to sub-paragraph (2) of this paragraph, any such notice shall be given by being delivered by the immigration officer to the person to whom it relates.’ g

In fact, as I have already recounted, the notice was handed not to the applicant but to her solicitor, who raised no objection at the time, and indeed on some aspects of the evidence may have appeared to welcome it being given to him rather than anybody else. h

Counsel for the applicant having as I have said abandoned a number of matters which were to be ventilated, according to the terms of the notice of motion, has really taken three points. He says first of all that the certificate of refusal was of no effect because it was handed to the solicitor and not delivered to the applicant, that is to say to the person to whom it relates. To my mind it is quite clear that the draftsman of these regulations wished to emphasise that the notice was to be delivered and not sent through the post, or in any other form of communication, and no doubt it is right to apply the paragraph strictly to this extent, that in normal circumstances where the applicant is in a position to receive the notice and capable of understanding i a what it means, a wise immigration officer will follow the literal letter of Sch 1, and deliver it by hand to the applicant. But it seems to me impossible to hold that in these not uncommon cases, where the applicant is illiterate and quite incapable of dealing with her affairs at all, that there should be anything wrong in handing the certificate over to someone authorised by her to receive it. It seems to me an inevitable inference in such a case as the present that the legal adviser, who was

b representing the applicant and who was handling the whole affair on her behalf, should be regarded as a person having authority to receive the notice. Accordingly in my judgment there is nothing in the first point.

The second point is that the investigation having taken place in a series of interviews, in the manner which I have described, it is said that the initial notice under Sch 1, para 1 (2), of a requirement for the applicant to submit for further examination
c should have been renewed in the form of a new notice of that kind at the close of each section of the interview. Accordingly it is argued that when the initial interview finished at 14.30 hours, a notice should have been served, as indeed it was, and that a later notice should have been served at the end of the second and third interviews. For my part I find no foundation whatever in this argument. There seems to me to be no function in the notice referred to in para 1 (2) of Sch 1 except to provide for d the contingency where the examination is not to be completed within the time specified in that paragraph, that is to say the initial 24 hours, now 28 days. If in fact the investigation is concluded and a decision to admit or refuse is made within that period, it seems to me that such a notice has no function, and it is a matter of total irrelevance whether it was ever given at all, or once or more than once. In any event I do not subscribe to the suggestion that new notices are required as the enquiry itself
e goes on, but the short answer in the present case is that no situation ever arose in which the notices under para 1 (2) would have any relevance at all.

The third and the last point made by counsel for the applicant is under para 2 (3) of Sch 1 which, still dealing with a notice of refusal, provides:

f 'Subject to the following provisions of this Schedule, a notice under this paragraph [i.e. a notice of refusal] shall not be given to any person unless he has been examined in pursuance of paragraph 1 of this Schedule, and shall not be given to any person later than twelve hours after the conclusion of his examination (including any further examination) in pursuance of that paragraph.'

The argument here is that the examination under para 1 which undoubtedly took place in respect of the applicant was concluded at 21.00 hours on 14th September
g at the end of the third interview to which I have referred. Counsel for the applicant points out that between that hour and 13.30 hours on the following day, when refusal was in fact notified, there was an interval of more than 12 hours, indeed an interval of 16½ hours, and so he says that the notice of refusal was invalid in that it was given out of time under the terms of para 2 (3).

This argument depends entirely on the validity of counsel for the applicant's h submission that the examination was concluded at 21.00 hours on the evening of 14th September. Counsel for the respondent's argument is that when regard is had to Mr Fuller's explanation of the deferment until the following day and of the desire to receive information by Telex from Lahore, the irresistible conclusion is that the examination had not been concluded on the previous evening, and for my part I find that conclusion entirely acceptable. I do not think the examination was concluded on the previous evening at 21.00 hours, any more than it had been at the end j of either of the earlier interviews. I think that the examination was still in force right up to and including the time when notice of refusal was given at 13.30 hours on 15th September.

In my judgment the three points which have been clearly and economically made by counsel for the applicant are each and severally without foundation, and I would find it necessary to refuse this application.

Will – Construction – ‘Descendants’ – Whether ‘descendants’ apt to include collateral relations.

By her will the testatrix bequeathed part of her residuary estate ‘to be divided equally between [such of] the descendants on the one hand of my late Mother and [such of] the descendants on the other hand of my late Father’ as her trustees should think fit. At the date of the will the testatrix’s parents were both dead and, as they had been married only to one another, it was impossible that any person could be a descendant of one but not the other. Further, the testatrix had never married and her four brothers and sisters had predeceased her without issue. On a summons to determine the true meaning of the will it was contended on behalf of the collateral relations of the testatrix who were not statutory next-of-kin that, since there could be no lineal descendants of the testatrix’s parents, the word ‘descendants’ should be construed as meaning collateral relations, being descendants of the testatrix’s grandparents. e

Held – It was impossible to say that, either in the ordinary use of English language or in legal language, the word ‘descendants’ was apt to include collateral relations (see p 12 b and p 13 d, post). f

By a summons dated 28th January 1971 the plaintiffs, Hubert Arthur Riddick and

July 7th. PENNYCUICK V-C. I now turn to the next question which has arisen under the will of the testatrix, on which I reserved my judgment. It will be remembered that the testatrix directed that her residuary estate was to be held on trust as to one-tenth for certain charitable purposes, as to one-tenth for certain persons or institutions as the trustees should decide, and then:

d 'As to the remainder of my Estate to be divided equally between the descendants on the one hand of my late Mother and the descendants on the other hand of my late Father my Trustees in this respect in their entire and sole discretion being empowered to make such enquiries and investigations as they think fit (but no more) and to divide the respective halves of the remainder of my Estate between such of the said respective descendants living at my death as they shall think fit having regard particularly to any who may appear to be in need of help.'

One then turns to the family tree which has been exhibited to the affidavit on the summons and one finds that at the date of her death the state of the testatrix's family was as follows. Her parents were Robert Youngman Thurlow and Clara Thurlow.

f They were first cousins, but nothing turns on that fact. There were five children of Robert Youngman and Clara, two daughters who predeceased the testatrix and two sons who likewise predeceased the testatrix. None of those four brothers and sisters had any issue. The testatrix was never married. Turning to the collaterals, the testatrix's mother had a sister, Mary Ann Jackson, who had a daughter Mrs Helen Bennett, who is still living. Mrs Bennett in turn has three children and two of them have children. The testatrix's mother also had a brother William who had a daughter, Jane Maria Howell, who predeceased the testatrix. She had five children who are still living. The brother William also had a daughter Dorothy, who is still living, and she has a daughter Daphne Elisabeth Ann Clegg.

g On the present summons Mrs Clegg has been joined to represent those collateral relations of the testatrix who are not statutory next-of-kin, she not being one of the next-of-kin because her mother is still living. Mrs Bennett was originally joined to represent the statutory next-of-kin. She, however, has taken no part in the proceedings and one of the sons of Mrs Howell, namely Ronald, has been joined to represent the statutory next-of-kin.

h It is clear that when the testatrix refers firstly to the descendants of her mother and secondly to the descendants of her father she cannot possibly have intended the word 'descendants' to mean issue. There are two reasons for this. In the first place, her father and mother were married only to one another and, therefore, they being both dead at the date of her will, it was impossible that any person could be a descendant of one but not of the other, and yet the testatrix contemplated two different classes of descendants taking equal shares. In the second place, all of the descendants of the testatrix's parents except herself having died, there could never in fact be any descendant of either of them. That being the position, counsel for Mrs Clegg has contended that in that clause in the will the word 'descendants' should be construed as meaning collateral relations, being descendants of the testatrix's grandparents; that limits it to the three stirpes to which I have referred. a

Apart from authority it seems to me that the word 'descendants' is totally incapable of referring to collateral relations. The word 'descendants' in its ordinary meaning in the English language means 'issue' and nothing else. Counsel, however, has cited two cases decided in the last century, the latter of which, he says, supports his contention. b

The earlier case is that of *Craik v Lamb*¹ where the headnote states:

"Testator gave all the residue of his real and personal estate unto and equally between and amongst all his relations who might claim and prove their relationship to him by lineal descent. He had no wife or issue at the time of making his will, nor afterwards. He died, leaving several first cousins his next of kin. Held, that the first cousins were entitled to the residuary estate, both real and personal'. c

The reason given is that the testator could not have intended as beneficiaries those who were lineally descended from himself and, that being so, the particular words used by him, i.e. 'relationship to him by lineal descent', could clearly be construed as denoting lineal descent from a common progenitor. That case, admittedly, is of very little assistance. d

The other case on which counsel relied is that of *Best v Stonehewer*² before the Master of the Rolls and the Court of Appeal. The headnote in the former report states³:

"A testator directed an estate to be sold on the decease of his sister and three others, and the produce paid to such persons as should then "be nearest in blood to him as descendants from his great-grandfather, J. S". The testator and his sister, both advanced in years, were the only lineal descendants of J.S. Held, that the collateral descendants of J.S. were entitled.' e

The headnote omits the critical words 'and whose kindred with me originates with him'. After reading the words, Sir John Romilly MR said⁴: f

"Mr. Joshua Stonehewer had no lineal descendants except the testator and his sister, and, at the time when the testator made his will, it was highly improbable that either of them would leave any issue surviving either of them. By the words of the will, the property of the testator was to go to the descendants of Joshua Stonehewer alive at the decease of the survivor of four persons, of whom his sister was one. The words therefore could not mean lineal descendants, because on the death of the sister after the testator, and without leaving any issue, there could be no lineal descendants. The Court has, therefore, to consider whether it is possible to put a fair intelligible meaning on the words, for if it is not, then there must be an intestacy and the Plaintiff would be entitled. I think it is not only possible to put an intelligible meaning on these words, but that, in truth, the meaning of the testator is very obvious. It is usual, not merely in legal language, but even in popular parlance, to speak of two classes of descendant, the lineal descendants and the collateral descendants. In fact, if this were not so, the word lineal would be wholly superfluous as applied to descendants, but it is usual to call the transfer of an estate occasioned by the death of the holder of it as "the descent of the estate", and in like manner it is usual to call the person on whom it descends the descendant. The definition of "descendant" g a in Lord Coke, in Sir William Blackstone, and indeed in all the law books, bear out this view. This is also confirmed by the definition to be found in the best dictionaries. Johnson gives us one of the meanings of the word “descent”—the transmission of any thing by succession and inheritance. In truth, unless the issue of the brother of a man who died intestate be called “the descendants” of that intestate, there is no word which would express the class; and unless we adopt this view, the words “collateral descendants”, so frequently to be found in law books, are mere jargon without any meaning.

b ‘Suppose the testator here had used these words “collateral descendants”, could anyone have doubted his meaning? He says “descendants”, he had no lineal descendants, then he meant mere collateral descendants. It is impossible for this Court to limit the words of a testator by a hypercritical and somewhat pedantic refinement to a narrow and unusual meaning, merely because it is not perhaps quite exact as familiarly used, and to do all this for the purpose of creating an intestacy. The words on which I hesitated on Saturday, viz., “whose kindred with me originates from him”, do not, on reflection, offer, to my mind, any difficulty. He, Joshua Stonehewer, is the link or point of union up to which both arrived, the testator directly and lineally, and the Defendants directly up to Thomas the brother, and thence collaterally to Joshua.’

c If that decision stood alone it would certainly provide powerful support for the argument advanced by counsel, but I must say that, for myself, I would find it impossible to say that either in the ordinary use of the English language or in legal language, the word ‘descendants’ was apt to include collateral relations. Apparently when that judgment was given it was apt, not merely in legal language but even in popular parlance, so to describe a collateral relation but that was a century ago and I do not think it is so today. Words sometimes change their nuance over the years both in popular and in legal language.

e However, I do not need to pursue that point, because the case went to the Court of Appeal where the decision of Sir John Romilly MR was upheld because the two lords justices were equally divided. Turner LJ, who supported the decision, did so on entirely different grounds from those relied on by Sir John Romilly MR. He said⁵:

f ‘The will is certainly difficult of construction, but upon the whole my opinion upon it agrees in substance with that of the Master of the Rolls. The will, as I read it, gives the estates, or rather the proceeds of them, to the persons or person of a specified class or classes who at the specified time shall be nearest in blood to the testator; the words “as descendants from my great-grandfather Joshua Stonehewer, and whose kindred with me originates from him”, describing the class or classes from which the devisees or legatees are to be taken, and the words “nearest in blood to me” describing what members of the class or classes are to be taken. Looking at the case in this point of view, the true question seems to me to be, whether the words descriptive of the class or classes from which the devisees or legatees are to be taken are to be construed as referring to one set of persons only, the descendants from the great-grandfather, or to two sets of persons, those descendants and also the persons whose kindred with the testator originated from the great-grandfather . . . It was argued, for the Appellant, that these latter words do not admit of being construed otherwise than as applying to descendants of the great-grandfather—that they are, in fact, no more than an emphatic declaration by the testator that those descendants (and those descendants only) were the persons who were intended to be the objects of the testator’s bounty; but I cannot assent to that argument. I think these words were intended to apply to persons whose kindred with the testator resulted from his (the testator’s) descent from the great-grandfather.’

Then he dealt with the word 'originate', and said⁶:

'... according to the true construction of the will, the Plaintiff is a trustee of the estates in question, or of the proceeds of the sale thereof, for such persons or person as at the time of the decease of the testator's wife were or was nearest in blood to the testator of a class composed of the descendants of the testator's great-grandfather Joshua Stonehewer, and of the persons whose kindred with the testator originated from their being related to his said great-grandfather . . .'

So Turner LJ there is not saying, as Sir John Romilly MR was saying, that the word 'descendants' includes collateral relations; what he is saying is that on the true construction of the will two separate classes of objects are denoted, namely a class consisting of descendants from the great grandfather, and also another class consisting of those whose kindred with the testator originated from the great-grandfather. On that construction the case is of no assistance to the argument on behalf of Mrs Clegg. Knight Bruce LJ disagreed with both constructions. No other authority has been cited which would support the argument put forward on behalf of Mrs Clegg, which I am free to reject, and which I do reject.

I would like only to mention one further matter. As I have said, it is clear beyond argument that the testatrix when she used the word 'descendants' did not intend that word to mean 'issue'. In other words, it is perfectly clear that something has gone wrong with the expression of her intention in this provision. I have been somewhat exercised whether this might be a case in which the court would be justified in striking out the word 'descendants' and substituting some other word, the obvious other word being 'relations'. The principle on which the court acts in this context is set out in Re Whitrick (decd), *Sutcliffe v Sutcliffe*⁷, in which the Court of Appeal approved a passage in Jarman on Wills⁸ in these terms:

'Where it is clear on the face of a will that the testator has not accurately or completely expressed his meaning by the words he has used, and it is also clear what are the words which he has omitted, those words may be supplied in order to effectuate the intention, as collected from the context.'

Undoubtedly the first of those conditions is satisfied here. It might, perhaps, be arguable that the second is also satisfied. Counsel for Mrs Clegg has, however, disclaimed any contention on those lines. He found it impossible to contend that it is clear what word the testatrix did intend to use where in fact she used the word 'descendants'. There is no doubt difficulty in substituting the word 'relations' and I must leave it there.

I propose, accordingly, to answer question 2 in the negative; that is to say, the remainder of the testatrix's estate is undisposed of and devolves as on the intestacy of the testatrix.

Judgment accordingly.

VACATION COURT, CHANCERY DIVISION

GOULDING J

b 2nd, 3rd SEPTEMBER 1971

Trade union – Action – Action for wrong done to union – Proper plaintiff – Unregistered trade union not entitled to sue in own name – Executive council of union acting contrary to policy declared by union conference – Action by individual members of union – Rule in Foss v Harbottle not applicable to unregistered trade union – Individual members entitled to injunction requiring executive council to act in accordance with union policy.

c Trade union – Action – Action for wrong done to union – Proper plaintiff – Remedy within power of union itself – Application of rule in Foss v Harbottle – Applicability of rule in cases of urgency – Right of action by individual members – Executive council of union acting contrary to union policy – Power of union conference to approve or disapprove actions of executive council – Urgency precluding union from taking effective action in time – Individual members entitled to injunction requiring executive council to act in accordance with union policy.

At their annual conference in June 1971 the National and Local Government Officers Association ('NALGO'), an unregistered trade union, passed the following resolution:

e 'That this Conference is opposed to the entry of Britain into the European Economic Community (the Common Market) unless it can be shown to be in the long-term interests of both Britain and the Community.' Subsequently the National Executive Council of NALGO requested its Service Conditions Committee to consider the government's white paper on the Common Market and to report the committee's views on this subject to a meeting of the council to be held on 7th August 1971. On 6th August

f the committee passed a resolution which stated that in their view the white paper did not in itself enable any firm declaration to be made that it could be shown to be in the interests of Britain and the community that Britain should enter into the community but nevertheless 'in the light of the public debate which has taken place over the past few months' the committee favoured Britain's accession. The committee duly minuted their resolution to the council. On the following day the council

g approved the committee's minute and adopted it as being the view of the council. The council then instructed the NALGO delegates to the Trade Union Congress to be held on 6th September 1971 to oppose a motion on the agenda against entry into the Common Market and to support another motion favouring entry. The plaintiffs by their motion sought (i) a declaration that the instructions to the NALGO delegates were ultra vires the union's rules and consequently invalid, (ii) mandatory injunctions

h cancelling the existing instructions and requiring the council to instruct the delegates to vote on the Common Market issue in accordance with the union's general policy as laid down at its last conference. The defendants contended, inter alia, that even if the instructions given by the council to the delegates were ultra vires the union's rules, the court was precluded from intervening by virtue of the rule in Foss v Harbottle^a.

j Held – The plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration and mandatory injunctions sought for the following reasons—

(i) the conference resolution could not be construed as delegating power to the National Executive Council to reverse the policy of the union on the Common Market;

the words 'unless it can be shown to be in the long-term interests of both Britain and the Community' in the resolution meant 'shown to a future conference of NALGO' (see p 21 a and b, post); even if the National Executive Council had been authorised to reverse the policy of the union on being satisfied that entry into the Common Market was in the long-term interests of Britain and the community, the resolution failed to record that the council were so satisfied and hence, in their instructions to delegates, the council acted inconsistently with the union policy as laid down at the conference (see p 21 g, post); accordingly the council were not entitled to give these instructions for to do so was to arrogate to themselves a power to determine the policy of the union and further to alter the policy actually declared by the conference (see p 21 c, d and j to p 22 a, post);

(ii) the rule in Foss v Harbottle^a did not apply to the case of an unregistered trade union which was incapable of suing in its own name (see p 24 a, post); dicta of Mellish LJ in MacDougall v Gardiner (1875) 1 Ch D at 25, of Romer J in Cotter v National Union of Seamen [1929] 2 Ch at 71, and of Jenkins LJ in Edwards v Halliwell [1950] 2 All ER at 1066 applied;

(iii) alternatively, even if the rule in Foss v Harbottle^a did apply to an unregistered trade union, the rule should not be applied in the present case since it was impossible in the time available to summon a special conference of NALGO and the result of applying the rule would therefore be to deprive the majority of an opportunity of carrying out their will (see p 24 e and f, post).

Motion

This was a motion whereby the plaintiffs, Geoffrey Roberts Hodgson, Jack Tinsdale and John Hall Fraser, members of the Leeds branch of the National and Local Government Officers Association ('NALGO'), applied for a declaration and mandatory injunctions against NALGO. In the course of the hearing Goulding J gave leave for the addition as defendants to the motion, Frederick John Williams and William Whalley, sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all members of the National Executive Council of NALGO except the plaintiff Fraser, and Glyn John Phillips and Norman Wilson Bingham, sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all members of NALGO's delegation to the Trade Union Congress except the plaintiff Fraser, and as members of NALGO. The facts are set out in the judgment.

C M Smith for the plaintiffs.

I M Rankin QC and A G Steinfeld for the defendants.

GOULDING J. The facts which form the background to the present motion are not in dispute for the most part between the parties and indeed many of the facts must be of common knowledge to those who read the newspapers or listen to a the wireless. However, it will be necessary for me to go into some detail as to the development of the controversy.

b One starts off with this. That it is expected that at an early date proposals will be made to Parliament regarding the possible accession of the United Kingdom to the organisation of six European states connected by certain treaties and commonly known as the Common Market. But before any reassembling of Parliament, and in fact, as I understand, next week, there will occur a meeting of the Trade Union Congress. No evidence has been adduced before me as to the constitution or procedure of the TUC. I understand, however, that it is an association whose members consist of trade unions in the United Kingdom and that it holds an annual meeting at which delegates of the member unions attend and in that capacity debate and pass resolutions on matters of common interest. It appears that one or more motions will come before the TUC next week concerning the advantages or disadvantages c to the United Kingdom of accession to the Common Market. It also appears that the view taken by the TUC on such a matter may be of some general political influence.

The purpose of the present motion is to determine how the delegates of one trade union will deal with that union's votes at the TUC in relation to two motions concerning the Common Market. The union in question is the National and Local Government Officers Association, usually called, as I shall call it, 'NALGO'. The d plaintiffs in the action are three members of NALGO. They are, in fact, members and officers of the Leeds branch of the union. As the action was first constituted the only defendant was NALGO itself. NALGO was sued in the belief and on the footing that it was duly registered as a trade union under the Trade Union Acts. That belief was ill-founded. NALGO has never been registered. Its status as a trade union within the statutory definition is not in doubt because it holds a certificate e under the Trade Union Act 1913¹, which while it stands is conclusive. It is not, however, a registered trade union and accordingly in my view of the Act it has no power to sue or to be sued in its own name. Those representing NALGO said they were willing to waive any irregularity in the constitution of the action. It is not necessary to consider how far the irregularity could be cured in that way because f I have given leave for the addition as defendants of two representative members of the union's National Executive Council and two representative members of its delegation to the TUC so that there is no doubt that there are defendants effectively before the court.

NALGO is thus an unincorporated association and it is governed by a number of rules. It is happily unnecessary for me to examine the rules at any great length, but some of them are of critical importance. The definitions rule, r 2, includes among g others the following definitions:

h "Officer" means a person whose duties are wholly or mainly administrative, professional, technical, clerical or supervisory and whose employment is not by way of manual labour, who is employed whole-time or part-time by or under or who is paid either wholly or to a substantial degree directly or indirectly by any public authority in Great Britain, the Isle of Man or Northern Ireland, and includes an articulated pupil.

And the word 'Service' is defined as follows:

i "Service" means one of the following in Great Britain, the Isle of Man and Northern Ireland: the local government service, the electricity supply industry, the gas industry, the national health service, the transport industry, the water supply industry, or the service of any public authority as defined by these rules.

I do not think it is necessary that I should read the definition of public authority. It includes all statutory local authorities and a number of other statutory authorities. Then the objects of NALGO are defined by r 3. a

'The objects for which the Association is established are: (a) To organize the whole of the officers in all departments of each and every service. (b) To improve the conditions and protect the interests of the Association's members by collective bargaining, agreement, withdrawal of labour or otherwise. (c) To regulate the relations between such members and between them and their employers.' b

And then there follow a number of more detailed objects. I should read r 3 (f) and (g):

'(f) To give to the legislature, government departments and others, facilities for conferring with, and ascertaining the views of, persons engaged or interested in each and every service, and to confer or co-operate with government departments and employing authorities in regard to each and every service and officers. (g) To consider all Bills presented to, and all questions raised in Parliament affecting the interests of officers.' c

And after a number of other particular objects the rule ends up in r 3 (r): d

'To do all such other lawful things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects, or any of them.'

In my judgment it is within the objects of the union as so expressed to state a collective view with regard to major political questions like that of the Common Market and to represent that view either directly to Her Majesty's government or through the TUC or otherwise as may be thought fit. Thus, in my judgment, the formulation and propagation of collective opinion about the Common Market proposals is in no sense ultra vires the union, even within the limited range in which such a concept can be applied to an unincorporated association. e

'Conferences: The general policy of the Association shall be directed by Conference. An annual Conference shall be held on such dates and at such place as the Council may from time to time determine, and a special Conference may be held in the circumstances referred to in rule 38. Subject to the provisions of rule 37 each session of a Conference shall be a public session.' f

The following rules contain very elaborate provisions as to the constitution of a conference, the mode of summoning it and the taking of votes. I do not think it is necessary that I should go into those. I may mention perhaps that the requisition of a special conference, otherwise than by the National Executive Council, requires the concurrence of the chairmen and secretaries of at least fifty branches authorised by resolutions of their branches. The essential provision for conference is that it meets annually and special conferences are subject to an unusual and not very speedy machinery of convening. g

I pass now to rr 64 and 65, which are the first of a number of rules dealing with the National Executive Council. h

'64. The Council: The affairs of the Association shall be managed by the National Executive Council, the members of which shall be elected annually. Subject to the provisions of rules 55 and 70, the members of the Council shall hold office from the conclusion of the annual conference at which they are declared elected until the conclusion of the next succeeding annual Conference. i

'65. Powers: The Council shall be vested with and shall exercise complete executive powers, provided that in the exercise of those powers it shall do nothing

a inconsistent with these rules or the general policy of the Association as laid down from time to time by Conference. It may appoint a committee for any such general or special purpose as in the opinion of the Council would be better regulated and managed by means of a committee, and may delegate to a committee so appointed, with or without restrictions or conditions, as it thinks fit, any functions exercisable by the Council.'

b And the rules then go into the composition of the council and the rules governing its procedure. I interpret rr 64 and 65 as conferring on the National Executive Council the fullest authority to manage the current affairs of the union and in the words of r 65 'complete executive powers', which I interpret as meaning complete powers to carry out the functions and policy of the union. But reading rr 64 and 65 with r 35, in my judgment, the council has no power of itself to decide general policy.

c The last annual conference of NALGO was held in the latter part of June 1971, at Douglas in the Isle of Man. That conference had before it certain proposals relating to the Common Market. One of those proposals was a notice of motion by the Leeds branch. That was number 112 on the agenda, and it read:

d 'That this Conference is opposed to the entry of Britain into the European Economic Community (the Common Market).'

The next item on the agenda, number 113, was an amendment proposed to item 112. The amendment was proposed by the North Western and North Wales District Council of the union and read:

e 'Add "unless it can be shown to be in the long-term interests of both Britain and the Community".'

f The National Executive Council requested the conference to refer both those items to itself, the council, for consideration. And indeed, on the agenda where an indication of the council's attitude I think is given, the words 'Ask for reference' appear against both items 112 and 113. The conference declined that invitation. The amendment was carried and the motion as amended was (in the terms of an affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiffs) overwhelmingly carried so that the effective resolution of conference was in the end in this form:

g 'That this Conference is opposed to the entry of Britain into the European Economic Community (the Common Market) unless it can be shown to be in the long-term interests of both Britain and the Community.'

h At about the same time or as I was informed somewhat before the date of the conference at Douglas, the government published the well-known white paper entitled 'The United Kingdom and the European Communities'. At a meeting of the National Executive Council on 10th July 1971, it was resolved that the Service Conditions Committee, one of the union's committees, should be requested to consider the white paper in order that the committee would be in a position to give its views on that subject to the National Executive Council at its meeting on 7th August. The Service Conditions Committee accordingly held a special meeting on 6th August, and passed a resolution consisting of two numbered paragraphs:

i '(1) That this Committee take the view, recognising that individual judgments vary in this matter, that the White Paper "The United Kingdom and the European Communities" does not in itself enable any firm declaration to be made in the terms of the Conference motion that "it can be shown to be in the long term interests of both Britain and the community".

(2) That nevertheless in the light of the public debate which has taken place over the past few months this Committee is in favour of Britain's accession to the European Economic Community.'

Next day, 7th August, there was as expected a meeting of the National Executive Council. One of the items on the agenda related to this matter of the Common Market and the first business done under that item of the agenda was that the chairman of the Service Conditions Committee moved that the National Executive Council approve that committee's minute, being in the two numbered paragraphs which I have just read. Before any vote was taken, an amendment was moved, namely that para (2) of the minute be not approved, (that was the paragraph recording the view of the Service Conditions Committee that it was in favour of Britain's accession to the community). The amendment was voted on first when 26 members of the National Executive Council voted for the amendment, 29 against. The amendment was accordingly lost. Then before the original substantive motion was voted on a Mr Rumney moved and he was duly seconded that:

'This Council is not able to make a firm declaration that entry to the Common Market is in the long term interests of both Britain and the community, and accordingly reaffirms that the association's policy is one of opposition to the entry.'

That motion was voted on and was lost by the same division of votes, 26 to 29, as the amendment. The original motion, approving the Service Conditions Committee's minute was then put to the meeting and was carried by 29 votes to 26. Accordingly the two paragraphs which I have read were adopted as the view of the National Executive Council. The National Executive Council proceeded to give instructions to the delegates of NALGO who were going, in due course, to the TUC and those instructions directed the delegates to oppose one motion that appeared on the TUC agenda against entry into the Common Market and to support another motion on the same agenda which was in favour of entry. Thus, in effect, the instructions given to delegates by the National Executive Council are, unlike the resolution of the conference at Douglas, in favour of accession to the Common Market. The instructions are not absolute. They are expressed as being subject to the delegation examining these decisions in the light of composite motions and amendments appearing on the final agenda (that is the final agenda of the TUC); however, as I read the instructions, that is a mere qualification to meet the practical difficulties that arise when at the TUC a number of separate motions are combined into one composite motion; it does not, in my view, affect the general force of the National Executive Council's instructions. It is also said in an affidavit by the general secretary of NALGO that in the last resort the delegates are entitled to consult their own consciences as to what is in the best interests or in accordance with the policy of NALGO and are not completely bound by the instructions of the National Executive Council. He does not give any authority for that view, and there does not appear to be any such qualification in the instructions themselves.

It is now necessary to look again at the resolutions passed by the annual conference of NALGO and subsequently by the National Executive Council to see how far the National Executive Council was acting in accordance with the constitution of the union. When conference resolved that it was opposed to the entry of Britain into the Common Market unless it can be shown to be in the long term interests of both Britain and the community it necessarily raised the question, 'shown to whom?' It is contended here, for the plaintiffs, that the true reading of the resolution was that conference was opposed to the entry of Britain into the Common Market, unless it could be shown to a future conference to be in the long term interests of both Britain and the community. The defendants would have me read, 'unless it can be shown to the National Executive Council to be in the long term interests of both Britain and the community', on the footing that, as it were, conference was declaring a policy against the Common Market, but was giving authority to the National Executive Council to reverse that policy if it should be satisfied that the advantages of the market had been sufficiently demonstrated. I strongly suspect that those

a who passed the resolution had no very clear idea of what body of persons they had in mind when they used the phrase, 'unless it can be shown'. I cannot for myself read the resolution as delegating a power to the National Executive Council to reverse the policy of the union on this matter. Even if it was within the competence of conference to make such a delegation, as to which I will express no opinion, I do not think that the language used was sufficiently clear to amount to that. If I have to decide b on the interpretation of the amended resolution, I prefer the plaintiffs' view that what was contemplated was a change of mind by a future meeting of conference because of proof in the interval that accession to the Common Market was in the long term interests of both Britain and the community. It is, of course, true that such a saving was strictly unnecessary, because one conference can, as I understand the rules, always rescind the directions or policy expressed by its predecessor. Now if c I am right in preferring the plaintiffs' construction of that resolution, then in my judgment, the National Executive Council have done wrong in their instructions to delegates. For two reasons. One is, that they have arrogated to themselves a power to determine the policy of the union instead of merely managing the affairs of the union and acting in an executive capacity to carry out policy. The other reason is that, contrary to the direction in r 65², they have done something inconsistent with the general policy of the association as laid down from time to time by conference.

d If, however, the defendants' construction of the amended resolution 112³ is correct and the National Executive Council was authorised to reverse the policy of the union on being satisfied that entry to the Common Market was in the long term interests of both Britain and the community, the question arises whether the National Executive Council in fact has been so satisfied. It is quite clear from para (1) of the two e paragraph resolution that the National Executive Council took over from the Service Conditions Committee, that the committee did not consider that the White Paper satisfied the requirements of conference. Then they went on that nevertheless, in the light of the public debate which had taken place over the last few months, this committee is in favour of Britain's accession to the European Economic Community. Two of the 29 members who voted in favour of adopting those resolutions have sworn f affidavits and they, for themselves, appear to have taken the view that what was called the public debate had demonstrated that the long term interests of both Britain and the community would be advanced by joining the Common Market but they are only two of a large number and it would be contrary to principle for me to construe the written resolution in the light of what two of those who voted for it afterwards say was their understanding. Construing the resolution in itself, in g my judgment, para (2) does not, any more than para (1), record that the National Executive Council was satisfied on the point reserved by conference. Therefore, even on the defendants' construction of resolution 112, as amended and passed, I am of opinion that the National Executive Council acted inconsistently with the policy as laid down by conference when they gave the instructions which I have mentioned to the delegation.

h The evidence filed on behalf of the defendants draws attention to the difficulties inherent in NALGO's constitution. It is pointed out that conference is a large somewhat unwieldy body prone, although it is put more politely than this, to adopt rather woolly resolutions representing a degree of compromise between opposing opinions which are not a satisfactory basis for practical executive action and it is clear that in the ordinary way the National Executive Council do take it on themselves to j determine, with a good deal more precision than conference can normally provide, the policy of the union on various matters. One, of course, quite understands that sort of situation, it is a very common one, and as long as no acute differences arise, bodies often get along very well with constitutions that give rise to practical difficulties if strictly construed. Nonetheless, it appears to me, that once the question is raised,

2 See pp 18, 19, ante

3 See p 19, ante

it is apparent that the National Executive Council have no power to determine the general policy of the union, still less have they power to alter the policy actually declared by conference. a

Now it is said next that if the National Executive Council have given instructions to delegates which represent a departure on their part from their duty under the rules, the court is unable to interfere in the matter because of the well-known rule, primarily a rule of company law, known as the rule in *Foss v Harbottle*⁴. The general rule is that: b

‘First, the proper plaintiff in an action in respect of a wrong alleged to be done to a company or association of persons is prima facie the company or the association of persons itself.’

That broad statement occurs in the judgment of Jenkins LJ in *Edwards v Halliwell*⁵. c

The basis of the rule is that where a company or other body has provision in its constitution for a majority of the members to determine what acts within the company's powers shall be done, it is for the members in general meeting, or whatever is the proper machinery, to decide whether they approve of what their officers are doing in their name or not. If one member points out that the officers are transgressing the limits of their powers in some way, it is idle for the court to interfere, if immediately afterwards a general meeting is called and the majority of members ratify what has been done. It is pointed out that there is no evidence in the present case that any large body of NALGO's membership is incensed at the change of front on the part of the National Executive Council. The plaintiffs all come from the same branch, the branch that originally proposed the resolution directed against the Common Market. They have not put in evidence any suggestion that they have the support of a large body of their fellow members. On the other hand, the National Executive Council itself was very nearly evenly divided on the decisive matters of voting to which I refer. d

Now the rule in *Foss v Harbottle*⁴ is an exception to the general principle pacta servanda sunt. It represents a case in which, although something has been a matter of express or implied agreement between the parties the court, nevertheless, will not intervene at the suit of an individual party to hold the other to the bargain. The basis of the exception was put long ago by Mellish LJ, on two alternative grounds. That was in *MacDougall v Gardiner*⁶. One ground was that the rule restrains what he called cantankerous litigation. If every member of a company or association is allowed as an individual plaintiff to complain against a thing that is done in the course of the company or association's business life would really become intolerable, because in a large body there are often a number of difficult members who would take every opportunity to involve the company and its officers in litigation. Therefore, the rule has its value as restraining vexatious litigation and, secondly, said Mellish LJ— e

‘if the thing complained of is a thing which in substance the majority of the company are entitled to do, or if something has been done irregularly which the majority of the company are entitled to do regularly, or if something has been done illegally which the majority of the company are entitled to do legally, there can be no use in having a litigation about it, the ultimate end of which is only that a meeting has to be called, and then ultimately the majority gets its wishes.’ f

This case does not fall within any of the well-known exceptions to the rule in *Foss v Harbottle*⁴. It was urged at one time, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that what was being g a done was an ultra vires act, but, in my judgment, that does not hold water at all. As I said when I referred to the objects of the union, it is plain that giving instructions of any kind to delegates to the TUC to vote this way or that or to abstain from voting on the Common Market questions, is entirely within the powers of the union as such. Further, this is not one of the cases in which the individual plaintiffs can say that something in the nature of a proprietary right of theirs is being infringed, as where b subscriptions are being altered, or qualifications for office are being altered, or benefits are being altered. Nothing of that kind is in question. Indeed, it is hard to imagine a matter further removed from an individual proprietary interest than the attitude of the union to proposals about the Common Market. Nor again is the case one of those in which an exception has been made from the rule on the ground that otherwise the majority might do by some informal machinery what under the rules can only be done with some special formality. Nothing of that sort arises c here.

However, two other points were made on behalf of the plaintiffs, which require somewhat more substantial consideration. First of all, NALGO as I have said, is not an incorporated body, it is not a registered trade union, it cannot in my view, sue in its own name. That being so, it is contended, the basis for the application of the rule in *Foss v Harbottle*⁷ is wanting. Going back to Jenkins LJ's formulation⁸:

d '... the proper plaintiff in an action in respect of a wrong alleged to be done to a company or association of persons is prima facie the company or the association of persons itself.'

That seems to assume that the company or the association as such can be a plaintiff. If the best that can be done is for one or more individuals plaintiffs to sue on behalf e of themselves and all other members who are of the same mind that is not quite the same thing as a suit by the association itself. The best one could do I suppose in applying the *Foss v Harbottle*⁷ principle to an unincorporated association not entitled to sue in its own name would be to say that the suit will not be entertained in normal circumstances unless the plaintiffs can show that they have been duly authorised by f the proper meeting or other procedure, to sue for the benefit of the association as such. But the matter is not put that way in the well-known formulations of the rule and I have not been referred to any authority where the rule has been applied to an unregistered trade union or other body not capable of suing in its own name. In *Cotter v National Union of Seamen*⁹ Romer J had to consider whether the rule applied to a registered trade union, and after referring to *MacDougall v Gardiner*¹⁰, and the well-known judgment of Mellish LJ, he said⁹:

g 'It is said, however, by the plaintiffs in the present action that this principle has no application to a trade union, inasmuch as a trade union differs in material respects from an incorporated company. There are no doubt many and important differences between the two bodies, but in the case of a registered trade union are those differences material to the present question? In my opinion h they are not. The principle, as I understand it, does not depend upon the existence of a corporation. The reasoning of it surely applies to any legal entity which is capable of suing in its own name and which is composed of individuals bound together by rules which give the majority of them the power to bind the minority. There does not appear to be in the books any actual decision to the effect of showing that the principle applies to such a body as a registered trade union. There is, however, a dictum of Russell J. to that effect in *Bloxham v. Amalgamated Marine Workers' Union*¹¹.'

So that the learned judge there apparently thought that there were two requirements for an application of the rule in *Foss v Harbottle*¹². One that there was a legal entity capable of suing in its own name, and two that the individual members should be bound by rules giving the majority the power to bind the minority. I therefore conclude that I ought not to extend the principle to the case of an unregistered trade union.

Now there was a second and an alternative ground on which it was said that the plaintiffs could escape from the difficulty raised by *Foss v Harbottle*¹², and that was the urgency of the matter. It is conceded that it would have been impossible after the date of the decisive meeting of the National Executive Council, namely 7th August, to go through the necessary procedure for summoning a special conference of the union. However large might have been the body of members who objected to the National Executive Council's action it would have been impossible to summon such a conference in time to ascertain its will before the meeting of the TUC. Therefore, the practical reasoning that the court should leave matters of internal decision to the proper constitutional machinery of the association really does not apply. If the directions given to delegates are left uncorrected and if the votes of the delegates should prove to be of great importance at the meeting of the TUC, it would be cold comfort to the majority of the next NALGO conference to pass a resolution saying, 'We really meant what we said last June and we did not intend to authorise the National Executive Council to alter it.' If that was their conclusion the horse would long since have left the stable and the view of the majority when expressed would be without practical effect. It is submitted, therefore, that the court ought not to allow the rule in *Foss v Harbottle*¹² to become the possible instrument of an injustice to the majority that the majority could not afterwards correct. There does not appear to be—so far as the researches of counsel have gone—any authority on that aspect of the matter. In my view, *Foss v Harbottle*¹² should not be applied if the result may be to deprive the majority of an opportunity of carrying out their will. In other words, if the constitutional machinery of the body cannot operate in time to be of practical effect, the court, in my view, should entertain the suit of a member or members not supported by the association itself. That, therefore, is an alternative ground on which I would decide in the plaintiffs' favour, if I am wrong in thinking that the rule in *Foss v Harbottle*¹² does not apply to an unregistered trade union. I am conscious that in deciding in favour of the plaintiffs I am differing from a reported decision of Goff J on facts which bear a striking similarity to those of the present case. It was the case of *McNamee v Cooper*¹³. It does not appear whether the union there in question was registered or not and it does not appear whether the other considerations on which I am relying were ever argued before the learned judge. Accordingly, I do not think that I ought to treat that decision where his Lordship rejected the claim on motion, as precluding the granting of the plaintiffs' application in the present case.

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SALMON, KARMINSKI AND STEPHENSON LJJ

13th, 14th, 15th, 16th JULY, 15th OCTOBER 1971

Damages – Measure of damages – Loss of future earnings – Deduction – Future living expenses – Plaintiff aged five years at time of accident – Severe brain injury – Evidence that plaintiff would be supported in state institutions free of cost for remainder of life – Plaintiff thereby saving on expenditure on future housing and maintenance which would have had to be met out of earnings – Whether future living expenses properly deductible in assessing figure for loss of earnings.

The plaintiff suffered very severe brain injury in a collision with a motor car driven by the defendant who agreed to pay 55 per cent of the sum which could properly be awarded to the plaintiff for the resulting damage and loss. The medical evidence established that the plaintiff, who was under five years old at the time of the accident, was unlikely to live beyond 40 to 50 years and that the life left to him was not a thing of much value; he was too crippled in mind and body to be able to work for a living and feelings of distress over what he had lost would play little part in his life. The trial judge quantified the plaintiff's loss in a single sum of £16,000 and so gave judgment for £8,800. In arriving at the figure of £16,000, the judge did not dissect it into its several parts, but he did state that he had 'made only a modest allowance' for lost future earnings because most of them would have been spent on housing and maintenance whereas, because of the accident, the plaintiff would be supported entirely in a state institution free of cost and 'such pleasure as he is capable of appreciating will be similarly provided'. The plaintiff appealed on the ground that the amount of damages awarded was inadequate.

Held – (i) Such national health service benefits as the plaintiff would receive were not deductible in assessing damages; although it would be proper to take into account expenditure which would have been incurred in earning future wages it did not follow that general living expenses were deductible. It was established that maintenance of an injured plaintiff free of cost by a friendly relative was not to be set off against the award of damages and, if the national health benefits were to be regarded as a form of public benevolence, there were no grounds for distinguishing between private and public benevolence. Alternatively the benefits were to be regarded as akin to the fruits of an insurance claim, which would not be deductible, in that they were financed by compulsory contributions from members of the public; the fact that the plaintiff had been injured so young and so badly that he could never pay his contributions was no reason for considering the nature of the benefits to be different in his case and deductible from his prospective earnings (see p 29 g, p 30 a, b, e and f and p 34 a to c, post).

(ii) If the benefit of free maintenance in a state hospital or institution was not taken into account the allowance for loss of earnings must be substantial. Further, in arriving at the sum to be awarded for pain and suffering and loss of amenities, there must be excluded from consideration the fact that little if any of the sum awarded was likely to be spent on the plaintiff in any way that could diminish his plight or affect his loss. The total sum of £16,000 fixed by the trial judge was far too low. The figure for pain and suffering and loss of amenities should be £20,000, and for loss of earnings £6,000; accordingly judgment would be given for 55 per cent of £26,000, i.e. £14,300 (see p 34 d to f and p 35 b, post). }

Appeal

The plaintiff, Timothy Nicholas Sean Daish (an infant suing by his grandfather and next friend, Albert Edward Daish), appealed against an order of Lyell J, dated 19th February 1971, awarding the plaintiff £8,800 damages for personal injuries against the defendant, Edward Winthrop Brenton Wauton. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Sir Joseph Molony QC and D C Gordon for the plaintiff.

Roy Beldam QC and W L M Davies for the defendant.

15th October. STEPHENSON LJ read the judgment of the court at the invitation of Salmon LJ. The plaintiff has suffered a very severe injury to his brain in a collision with a motor car driven by the defendant. The defendant has agreed to a pay him 55 per cent of the sum of money which can properly be awarded him for the resulting damage and loss. Lyell J considered four elements in the plaintiff's damage and loss and quantified them in a single sum of £16,000. He thereupon gave judgment for the plaintiff for £8,800. The plaintiff appeals on the ground that the sum is inadequate.

b 1. There was a loss of expectation of life. The plaintiff, under five years old when injured, is unlikely to live beyond the age of 40 to 50 years, particularly because he cannot walk many steps without falling or appreciate the dangers peculiar to his crippled condition and obvious to persons of ordinary intelligence. But the life left to him is not a thing of much value. So the award for this loss was rightly minimal.

c 2. The plaintiff 'has been almost wholly deprived of the chance of leading a normal life', as the judge correctly summarised the medical evidence. His intellect is retarded, he has difficulty in communicating or learning, his eyes are unco-ordinated, his speech is slow, he cannot easily put words together, the movements of his legs and arms are clumsy, he is too crippled in mind and body to be able to work for a living. He has had one epileptic fit and he may have more.

d 3. Into his pitiful condition he has and will have, as the judge put it, 'some, though probably little, and only transient, insight'. This seems to us a fair summary again of the medical evidence. What the plaintiff has left to him is not quite an awareness of what he has lost because he has never known it and could not recollect it, if he had. But just as he gets some pleasure from small successes, so he feels frustrated at his inability to overcome his many handicaps and with his approaching adolescence may become aggressive as he becomes increasingly aware of his difference from others. He is in this respect like a child blinded before growing old enough to remember how the world looked to eyes that could see but frustrated by being unable to see or to do without difficulty what comes easily to others. The judge quoted Mr Gordon Walker's description of the picture of the plaintiff's life as one of permanent suffering, but we consider that he rightly interpreted the view of the doctors to be that 'feelings of distress over what he has lost will play little part in his life' and that no complaint can justly be made of his accepting their view. He rightly appreciated that this boy will have more insight into his condition and a longer life to bear it than the plaintiff in the earlier case of *Oliver v Ashman*¹ which he considered very closely. There the expectation of life was (as appears from the report of the case in the Court of Appeal², but not at first instance³) reduced (at 20 months) from 60 years to 30 years and the boy's appreciation of his condition was so momentary as not really to cause him mental suffering, although it did produce some feeling of frustration.

g We consider, however, that the judge's assessment of these last two heads of damage, whether considered together as different aspects of loss of enjoyment of life or separately as loss of amenities coupled with mental suffering, cannot have been adequate, however great the care that should be taken to avoid overlapping in the awards of damages under these two heads and the next head for loss of enjoyment of life and for pecuniary loss: *Smith v Central Asbestos Co*⁴, per Lord Denning MR.

h 4. The judge has not told us what he has awarded for loss of future earnings. Indeed he has said that in arriving at the total figure he has not even in his mind dissected it into its several parts, thereby preferring *Watson v Powles*⁵ to *Jefford v Gee*⁶.

But what he has told us is that he has 'made only a modest allowance' for lost future earnings because most of them would have been spent on housing and maintenance whereas now the plaintiff will be supported entirely in a state institution free of cost, and 'such pleasure as he is capable of appreciating will be similarly provided'. In deducting from his estimated gross earnings the unspecified figure which he attributes to housing and maintenance expenses the judge was clearly following the decision of this court in *Oliver v Ashman*⁷ as expressed in the judgments of Willmer and Pearson LJ. Their view is, in our judgment, correctly stated in the headnote. Willmer LJ expressed his view in this way⁸:

'He [the plaintiff Oliver] will never have the expense of maintaining a home, whether for himself alone or for himself and dependants. He will never have to bear the cost of food and clothing, light, heat, and so forth. Throughout the greater part of his life there will be no cause for expenditure. In those circumstances it would seem prima facie quite wrong to have regard to any probable future loss of earnings without also having regard on the other side of the account, to the probable saving of what would ordinarily be the expenses of life. Oddly enough this is not a matter on which there seems to be any great wealth of authority. Reference was made to *Liffen v. Watson*⁹, but I do not think that that is at all a parallel case. There, the victim was fortunate enough to find a relative who was prepared to house her free of cost, and the court held, in my judgment properly, that that was not a matter to be taken into consideration for the purpose of reducing the award of damages. That seems to me to be a wholly different case from that of this plaintiff, who, so far as can be foreseen, will be detained for the rest of his life in a National Health institution. The point was touched on by LORD ATKIN in *Rose v. Ford*¹⁰ in the passage of his speech to which HOLROYD PEARCE, L.J., has already made reference. LORD ATKIN left the question unsolved; but at least what he said does give ground for thinking that he saw a distinction between earnings which would have been saved and earnings which would not. Possibly more help is to be derived from what was said by LORD REID in *British Transport Commission v. Gourley*¹¹: [He] said: "... No one would suggest that it is improper to take into account expenditure genuinely and reasonably incurred, or that the plaintiff's damages should be assessed on the fees which he would have continued to receive without regard to the outgoings which he would have continued to incur". *Gourley's case*¹² is, of course, a very different case from this, but so far as it goes that expression of view is in accord with what I should myself have conceived to be the right principle. In those circumstances, it seems to me that [Lord Parker CJ] was quite right when, in taking into account the possible future loss of earnings of this child, he expressed the view that the saving of the normal expenses of life should be set off against such loss bearing in mind that for most of this unfortunate child's life there will in fact be nothing on which to spend the money. What the future earnings of the child would have been had he not met with this accident must remain completely speculative; so also must the question how far such earnings would have exceeded what he would have been likely to spend on living and providing a home for himself and any dependants he might have.'

7 [1961] 3 All ER 323, [1962] 2 QB 210

'Secondly, there is the probable expectation that, after being kept at home for a few years and after having probably a rather short stay in a private institution, the infant plaintiff will go to a state institution and be kept there free of charge for the rest of his life. That greatly diminishes the probable maintenance liability and provides an important offset to the loss of earning capacity, which in any case has to be discounted because the earnings would not have begun for many years.'

Holroyd Pearce LJ expressed no view on this point, but his questions when defendant's counsel submitted that¹⁴ 'Expenses such as food, rent, liability to tax, etc., must be taken into account and set off against earnings' show that he had it in his mind and would not necessarily have accepted the view the other lords justices took of it.

*Oliver v Ashman*¹⁵ has attracted judicial notice and the notice of textbook writers but not, we think, on this point. We make these comments on the views of Willmer LJ¹⁶ which appear to bind the judge and this court if they are still good law.

(1) We cannot find that Lord Parker CJ in his judgment¹⁷ expressed the view attributed to him by Willmer LJ in the passage just quoted. It must be spelt out of his observation¹⁸ that:

'In addition, there are questions of taxation and other matters, but whatever view one takes as to eventual earnings, the figure must in the case of such a young child be heavily discounted.'

Defendant's counsel had submitted that¹⁹:

'In regard to his loss of opportunity of earning it must be borne in mind that he will be kept at the expense of the State and will not have to support a wife and family.'

We cannot infer from this submission—or from the way in which plaintiff's counsel in reply disputed the relevance of the child going into a state institution—that living expenses were one of the matters which Lord Parker CJ was taking into account in discounting his eventual earnings. Nor can we find any support for the ascription of this view to the Lord Chief Justice in the concessions made by leading and junior counsel for the plaintiff²⁰. They were claiming for the plaintiff his loss of future earnings in full and conceding not that living expenses, but only that expenses in earning wages, must be set off against them.

(2) Willmer LJ is founding his opinion to some extent on Gourley's case¹ and in particular Lord Reid's view² that account should be taken of 'expenditure genuinely and reasonably incurred'; but by those words in their context Lord Reid clearly meant outgoings incurred on fees earned such as rent and rates for an office, clerks' salaries, expenses of running a car: hence the concession of plaintiff's junior counsel. They are 'incurred in the process of earning the profits': expenses which Lord Tucker³ classed with 'expenditure which—although not actually a charge on earnings—is imposed by law as a necessary consequence of their receipt' as 'relevant to the ascertainment of the loss suffered by the party injured'. As Lord Tucker pointed out³, the problem is 'what items of expenditure following the earning of profits are to be taken into consideration and which are to be ignored' in ascertaining that loss; and none of their Lordships suggested that living expenses, as distinct from office expenses, should be taken into consideration. Indeed, Lord Goddard's suggested direction to a jury in his speech⁴, with which Lord Radcliffe and Lord Somervell of Harrow agreed, we take to imply that they should not; for the jury are to consider the plaintiff's 'spendable income', which Lord Goddard seems to equate with⁴ 'what he had left to support himself and his family after tax was paid'; not what he had left after supporting himself and his family and paying tax.

(3) The passage in Lord Atkin's speech in *Rose v Ford*⁵ referred to by Willmer LJ⁶ does perhaps suggest that earnings which would have been saved must be recoverable for the benefit of the estate of the deceased person, but that earnings spent may not be because they would not have been saved to increase his estate. However, in *Rose v Ford*⁷ their Lordships were not considering the problem which troubled Lord Tucker and others in Gourley's case⁸ nor the (as we think) different problem which confronts this court in the instant case, but a specific question raised by the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934. Lord Atkin is only asking: 'If [or, possibly, "as"] a living plaintiff can recover more for loss of earnings than he would have saved out of them, could the personal representatives of a dead person do the same?'

(4) Willmer LJ seems to distinguish the case from *Liffen v Watson*⁹ on the ground that maintenance by a friendly relation free of cost is⁶ 'wholly different' from maintenance by the state in a National Health institution free of cost. But Liffen's case⁹ was distinguished by defendant's counsel¹⁰ only on the ground that a right to be maintained by the state is not too remote, whereas purely charitable maintenance may be. If that was the only ground for distinguishing private benevolence from support by the state—and Willmer LJ gives no other—it may no longer be good since, as we hope to show, remoteness is no longer the test.

(5) The lords justices thought that they were applying the *Gourley*⁸ principle of real loss in deducting not tax but living expenses. They never considered, because they were not asked to consider, whether free maintenance at the public expense (in a sense on which we comment later) was a benefit which was not deductible like private charity: *Redpath v Belfast & County Down Ry*¹¹; or the fruits of insurance: *Bradburn v Great Western Ry Co*¹²; or a contributory police pension: *Parry v Cleaver*¹³.

We can find in Gourley's case⁸ only two references to benefits received by a plaintiff after his injury for which he seeks compensation, Earl Jowitt's reference to cases of insurance¹⁴ and Lord Reid's¹⁵ to 'a compensatory gain' in the following sentence:

'A loss which the plaintiff has suffered, or will suffer, or a compensatory gain which has come or will come to him, following on the accident may be of a kind which the law regards as too remote to be taken into account.'

When he came to reconsider such compensatory gains as the proceeds of insurance and benevolence in Parry's case¹⁶ Lord Reid discarded remoteness, whether in the a sense that the gains were too remote to have been foreseeable by the defendant or in the sense that the relationship between the plaintiff's source of loss and source of gain was too remote, in favour of their intrinsic nature as the reason for their not being brought into account.

b The House of Lords has now by a majority declared in *Parry's case*¹⁷ that the question to be asked is whether free maintenance at the public expense is a deductible benefit, that it is to be answered by considering not remoteness, as Lord Pearson¹⁸, dissenting, still thought, but the intrinsic nature of the benefit in the light of justice and public policy and that the decision in *Gourley's case*¹⁹ gives no help in answering it, although decisions on other benefits such as the fruits of insurance or benevolence may: see per Lord Reid²⁰ and Lord Pearce¹. (Lord Wilberforce² agreed that *Gourley's case*¹⁹ had no bearing on the matter, but he got little help from intuitive feelings of justice or from other types of benefit³ and he did not rely on public policy.) Applying Lord Pearce's words in *Parry's case*⁴:

d 'The most that the respondent can get from *Gourley's case*¹⁹ in the present case is that in claiming that he has lost something a plaintiff must prove a genuine factual loss not a technical unreal loss of something of which he would never in fact have had an actual benefit, since the court is looking for restitutio in integrum. And this, it can be argued, may have some indirect bearing on the things which he brings into account on the other side of the ledger.'

e Is the plaintiff to be treated as not having the actual benefit of his full wages merely because he would have spent them on his own or his family's maintenance? It cannot even be argued that the answer may be 'Yes' unless there is a corresponding benefit such as free maintenance to be brought into account on the other side of the ledger, as in this case. In this case it has been argued for the plaintiff that his free maintenance has not to be brought into account or alternatively if any sum is to be deducted because of it from the plaintiff's lost earnings it should be minimal, or at least not more than one-third of his lost earnings.

f We have to consider *Gourley's case*¹⁹ in first computing the plaintiff's actual net loss of earnings and *Parry's case*¹⁷ in then considering whether any particular gain or benefit is to be deducted against net loss. That two-fold operation was never performed in *Oliver's case*⁵. *Bradburn's case*⁶ was not cited to the court, nor *Redpath's*⁷. The court carried out the first stage only.

g We must, in our view, carry out both stages. And we understand counsel for the defendant to concede that if the benefit of state maintenance is not deductible at stage two, neither are the living expenses at stage one. This concession is clearly right. The plaintiff's real loss of earnings can only be ascertained by comparing what he would have earned but for his injury with what he is earning or not earning as a result of it. In most cases an injured man will have living expenses after he is injured which are roughly equivalent to those he would have had to pay if he had not been injured. The expenses therefore cancel each other out. Only if a plaintiff without h dependants to support is in hospital for a long period, and is not a fee-paying patient, is there any reason for a defendant to bring into account the living expenses which the plaintiff is saving by the misfortune he suffers from the defendant's tort. a

Compare the observations of Asquith LJ in giving the judgment of this court in *Shearman v Folland*⁸. In that case, on which both counsel in this case rely, the court was concerned with the special damage of 'a migratory hotel-dweller'. And it was concerned with what the defendant should pay towards the expenses of the hotel-dweller's temporary maintenance in a nursing home after being injured and before her action was tried. It was not concerned with her general damages, or with a potential wage-earner, or with a plaintiff who makes no claim against a defendant for the expenses which both plaintiff and defendant have been saved by his 'taking advantage of facilities available under the National Health Service Act, 1946' to be maintained permanently free of charge. Those words come from s 2 (4) of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act 1948, which deters a defendant faced with a claim for medical expenses from resisting it on the ground that the plaintiff should reasonably have been saved them by taking advantage of those facilities. That subsection throws no light on the problem we have to solve; nor, with all respect to the argument of counsel for the defendant, does s 212 of the Road Traffic Act 1960, which provides for the payment of expenses reasonably incurred by a hospital in treating traffic casualties. b

The irrelevance in most cases of a plaintiff's expenditure on keeping himself and his dependants is, we think, illustrated and confirmed by this court (or a majority of it) in drawing the contrast between the good husband with a wife to support and the self-indulgent bachelor (a bird perhaps as rare among plaintiffs as the migratory hotel-dweller) in *Fletcher v Autocar & Transporters Ltd*⁹. The married man is to be compensated 'for his loss of future earnings to the extent that he would have used them for supporting his wife' per Lord Denning MR¹⁰, or for 'the additional deprivation of being unable to support his wife and family . . . under the head of loss of earnings' per Diplock LJ¹¹. Salmon LJ dissented¹² from what the majority of the court said about deducting from the plaintiff's earnings, whether married or single, extravagant expenditure from which the defendant's negligence had saved him. He considered that if a plaintiff is likely to be prevented by the defendant's negligence from earning £X per year for Y years, he is entitled to be compensated for the whole amount of that financial loss, and that whatever he might have done with the money was irrelevant so far as damages are concerned. It follows that Salmon LJ agreed with the majority in making no deduction for the married man's expense of keeping a wife and family and we assume that all three lords justices would not have deducted the single man's expenditure in maintaining any dependants he might have. c

Are we then bound, as Lyell J thought he was, by the decision of this court in *Oliver's case*¹³ to deduct something for expenses which the plaintiff would have paid out of his earnings in support of himself or his family if he had not been disabled by the defendant's negligence from ever doing so? Or is it open to us, or indeed incumbent on us, to consider whether the benefit of free maintenance in a state hospital is deductible, and if we think that, like the benefit of free maintenance in a private house, it is not, to disallow any deduction for such expenses? d

We ought, as we have said, to consider the question in the light of *Parry's case*¹⁴. In that case Lord Pearce and Lord Wilberforce¹⁵ considered that a benefit would not be deductible if it was not necessarily intended as a substitute for earning capacity e a or its payment was not dependent on loss of earning capacity; and Lord Reid indicated how he might answer the question which we have to decide in this sentence¹⁶:

‘We do not have to decide in this case whether these considerations also apply to public benevolence in the shape of various uncovenanted benefits from the welfare state, but it may be thought that Parliament did not intend them to be for the benefit of the wrongdoer.’

b We have now to decide that very question with reference to national health service benefits without deciding the question in relation to other public benefits such as unemployment benefit or national assistance, which have already been the subject of decision in other courts and of comment in *Parry's case*¹⁷ by Lord Reid and Lord Wilberforce.

c We have also to decide it without having heard from counsel any analysis of the nature of national health service benefits or any consideration of the National Health Service Contributions Acts 1957 to 1965. A cursory investigation shows that national health service facilities were first financed by national insurance contributions paid by insured persons whether employed, self-employed or non-employed, by employers and out of moneys provided by Parliament; but since 1957 separate national health service contributions have been paid by these classes of persons and collected with their national insurance contributions.

d We think that we can gain more assistance from the views expressed by Sir Owen Dixon CJ and Windeyer J in *National Insurance Co of New Zealand Ltd v Espagne*¹⁸, which were considered in *Parry's case*¹⁹, as to the characteristics of benefits not to be regarded as mitigating loss, whether as a result of legislation or contract or benevolence; namely, that they were ‘conferred . . . independently . . . of a right of redress against others but so that they may be enjoyed by him [the plaintiff] although he enforce that right (*Espagne case*²⁰ per Sir Owen Dixon CJ); or that they were either—

e (a) received as a result of a contract he had made before the loss occurred and by the terms of that contract express or implied to be provided notwithstanding any rights of action he might have [or] (b) given or promised to him by way of bounty to the extent that he should enjoy them in addition to and not in diminution of any claim for damages.’

f (See the *Espagne case*¹ per Windeyer J who gave as illustrations of the latter alternative ‘public charitable aid and some forms of relief given by the State as well as private benevolence’.) Windeyer J was able to find that the pension for the blind awarded to the plaintiff Espagne was not a deductible benefit because the manifest policy of the Act brought it within the second category.

g We find it hard to say what the intention of Parliament was in relation to such circumstances as those of the present case when it conferred on contributors, and some who are not contributors, the right to national health service benefits. But it does seem clear that the effect, if not the intention, of this legislation was that these benefits should be conferred independently both of any loss of earning capacity and of any legal liability in another person to compensate the victim. A person injured entirely by his own fault or in an inevitable accident would be entitled to such benefits and so he would be in the perhaps unlikely event of his suffering no loss of earning capacity.

In our judgment, such national health service benefits as this plaintiff will receive are not deductible. Either they constitute public benevolence, and there is no sensible reason for distinguishing between public and private benevolence, or they are akin to insurance. They are financed in part at least out of compulsory contributions paid by all, or most, members of the public of whom in many if not most cases an injured party will be one. In that sense only are these benefits provided at the public expense—and ‘uncovenanted’. The fact that this plaintiff has been injured so young and so badly that he can never hope to attain the privilege of paying his contributions seems to us no reason for considering the nature of the benefits to be different in his case and deductible from his prospective earnings. There is no principle—and, if we except *Oliver v Ashman*², no authority—which requires that such benefits should be deductible. Nor do we consider that public policy does so. It is unlikely that there will be many cases in which the question arises; and we see no reason to add to the difficulties of estimating pecuniary loss by requiring an assessment of a saving of hypothetical expenses out of kindness to the wrongdoer in those few cases where he has already benefited by not having to pay the plaintiff he has injured a substantial sum for future medical expenses.

If the benefit of free maintenance in a state hospital or institution is not to be taken into account, it cannot be and is not disputed that the allowance for loss of earnings should not be ‘modest’ but must be substantial. It is impossible to say what the plaintiff would have done or earned if he had reached normal manhood. Assuming that he had become a labourer earning £20 a week net at about 20 years of age—and that assumption may be too favourable to the defendant—the multiplier to be applied to the resulting annual loss of about £1,000 cannot be less than 12. The uncontradicted medical evidence is that he is likely to live into his forties. Give him £12,000 on that basis and halve it because the sum he is awarded for lost earnings will double in the decade before he would have earned it, and you get what we think is a fair figure of £6,000.

What sum should be added to that for the loss of the amenities of life and such mental pain as his limited awareness of it and his dreadful disabilities cause him? We have no doubt that the total sum of £16,000 fixed by the judge is far too low for these alone and they demand a figure much greater than £10,000. We must do what the judge tried to do following *H West & Son Ltd v Shephard*³: ‘Exclude from consideration the fact that little if any of the sum awarded is likely to be spent on him in any way that could diminish his plight or affect his loss’; and even if we take, as he did, the undissected total of £11,000 awarded to the plaintiff Oliver ten years ago as a yardstick (though a very short one) we must, with him, make some allowance for the fall in the value of money in the last decade.

Dr Henson was of the opinion, helpful though not conclusive, that the plaintiff’s condition was worse than a paraplegic’s and less bad than a quadriplegic’s. On 14th July this court affirmed an award by Forbes J of over £36,000, including £20,000 for pain and suffering and loss of amenities, to a paraplegic with unusual and serious elements in his condition, including physical pain: *Dougan v British Steel Corp*⁴. We were asked by counsel for the plaintiff to look at a judgment of Ackner J in *Alexander v Dispatch Motor Co*⁵, between the date of the hearing of this case before Lyell J and the date when he gave the judgment under appeal. Ackner J, on medical evidence which included that of the same Dr Henson, awarded a girl of 17, with brain damage which had produced a condition in some ways worse and in some ways better than the plaintiff’s, a total sum of £35,000, divided into £24,000 for loss of amenities and £11,000 for loss of earnings. (It is worth noting that counsel for the a defendants conceded that the fact that she would be receiving from the state free board and lodging in the institution where she was likely to spend her life should not be reflected in the quantum of damages. There is accordingly no trace of that judge's scaling down her earnings by deducting living expenses.) We were told that there is an appeal from that judgment, but on liability only.

b We do not think that a detailed comparison of the facts of this case with that case, or indeed any other case, would give any real help in arriving at a fair measure of this plaintiff's damages. We would assess his enjoyment of life in all its aspects, what he has lost and what he feels about it, at £20,000; and when we include the nominal award for loss of expectation of life in that £20,000 or in the £6,000 for loss of earnings, we are not conscious of any overlap or duplication or of any need to reduce the total sum of £26,000.

c We allow this appeal and give the plaintiff judgment for 55 per cent of £26,000, i.e. £14,300.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, CAIRNS AND ROSKILL LJ

f Shipping – Charterparty – Construction – Baltime charterparty – Exemption clause – Damage – Second sentence of clause exempting owners from liability for ‘damage . . . whatsoever and howsoever caused’ – ‘Damage’ in this part of clause to be widely construed – Not limited to physical loss but covering financial loss – Claims by charterers for loss of time and for expenses resulting from master’s wrongful refusal to enter a port – ‘Damage’ wide enough to cover both heads of claim – Owners exempt from liability.

g Arbitration – Error on face of award – Application to set aside – Construction of clause in charterparty – Relevant clause not set out in award – Whether court entitled to look at charterparty – Proper course to raise point of construction by way of special case stated and not on motion to set aside award.

h A dispute between the charterers and the shipowners was referred to arbitration. The umpire’s award showed that by a charterparty in the Baltime form the shipowners let the vessel Charalambos N Pateras on a time charter to the charterers. During the time charter the master of the vessel wrongfully refused to take the vessel into the port of Ampala to discharge a part cargo. On that account the charterers claimed damages under two heads. First, they claimed £5,037 1s 2d for loss of time, and deducted that sum from the hire payable by them, contending that because of the master’s refusal to enter the port they had been deprived of the use of the vessel for a number of days. Secondly, the charterers claimed £4,319 11s 1d as expenses to which they had been put because of the master’s refusal to enter the port. The shipowners sought to justify the master’s refusal, and in the alternative relied on an exemption in the charterparty to defeat the charterers’ claims. The umpire awarded and adjudged that although the shipowners had failed to justify the master's refusal to enter the port, they had established that they were fully protected by 'the exemption clause in the charterparty' and that therefore the charterers' claims failed. The parties did not ask for a case stated, but the charterers applied by a motion to set aside the award on the ground that it was bad in law on the face of it. The exemption clause (cl 13) was not set out in the award but it was accepted that for the purposes of the motion the court could look at the clause. The first sentence of cl 13 made the owners responsible for certain specified types of delay and 'loss or damage to goods on board' when due to the default of the shipowners. The second sentence provided (in effect) that the shipowners were not to be responsible for those certain specified types of delay or loss or damage when not due to the owners' default, and then continued, in the second part of the sentence, '... nor for damage or delay whatsoever and howsoever caused even if caused by the neglect or default of their servants'. On the charterers' appeal from the dismissal of their motion for an order to set aside the award for error of law on its face,

Held—The appeal would be dismissed since the shipowners were exempt from liability for both the charterers' claims by virtue of the exemption in the second part of the second sentence of cl 13 for the following reasons—

(i) the word 'damage' there, being linked with the words 'whatsoever and howsoever caused', should not be limited to physical damage, but should be widely construed to include financial loss, 'damage' in this part of cl 13 being used in a wider sense than in the first sentence of the clause, where it was limited to physical damage to goods (see p 39 a, b, e and f and p 40 g, post);

(ii) (per Roskill LJ) the word 'damage' in the second sentence of cl 13 should be given a wide construction to include financial loss since the object of cl 13 was to establish a mutual code of shipowners' and charterers' responsibilities for loss or damage whether physical or financial, and to protect shipowners as far as possible from claims other than claims which fell specifically within the first sentence of the clause (see p 40 d to f, post);

(iii) accordingly 'damage' in the second sentence of cl 13 was wide enough to cover both the heads of claim made by the charterers (see p 39 c, d and g, post).

Louis Dreyfus et Cie v Parnaso Cia Naviera SA [1959] 1 All ER 502 considered.

Per Roskill LJ. Having regard to the form of the award it is extremely doubtful whether it was proper to look at either the charterparty or cl 13. If the charterers wished to raise a point on the construction of cl 13, it should have been raised by way of a special case stated for the decision of the court and not ex post facto on a motion to set aside the award for alleged error of law (see p 39 h to p 40 b, post).

- This was an appeal by the charterers, Nippon Yusen Kaisha, from the order of Mocatta J, dated 1st April 1971, dismissing the charterers' application by notice of motion dated 21st December 1970, for an order that the award of an umpire, Sydney Fowler Esq, dated 25th November 1970, in favour of the shipowners, Acme Shipping Corpn, be set aside on the ground that the award contained an error of law on its face. The award, so far as material, stated that by a charterparty in the Baltime form dated 10th March 1969 the shipowners let their vessel Charalambos N Pateras to the charterers on the terms therein defined. A dispute arose thereunder, the charterers alleging that during the charterparty period the master had wrongfully refused to take his ship into the port of Ampala and there discharge a part cargo as ordered by them. The charterers therefore claimed (a) a declaration that they were justified in having retained from hire due from them a sum equal to £5,037 1s 2d representing loss of time (or, alternatively, damages in the same amount); and (b) damages of £4,319 11s 1d representing the additional expenses which they had to meet as a result. The shipowners sought to justify the master's refusal and, in the alternative relied on an exemption clause in the charterparty to defeat these claims. Moreover they sought the return of £5,037 1s 2d that had been retained from the hire by the charterers. The umpire, having accepted the reference of the dispute and having heard the respective arbitrators and duly considered their submissions and the evidence in support of them, awarded and adjudged that, although the shipowners had failed to justify the refusal of the master to enter the port of Ampala, they had established that they were fully protected by 'the exemption clause in the charter-party' and that therefore the charterers failed in toto.

R A MacCrindle QC and A G S Pollock for the charterers.
Anthony Evans QC and A D Colman for the shipowners.

- LORD DENNING MR. This is a motion to set aside an umpire's award on the ground that it is bad in law on the face of it. The award shows that on 10th March 1969 the shipowners let the vessel named Charalambos N Pateras on a time charter for three to five months to the charterers, Nippon Yusen Kaisha. It was in the Baltime form. During the time charter she approached the port of Ampala, which is in Nicaragua, Central America. The master wrongfully refused to take his ship into the port of Ampala. On that account the charterers claimed damages under two heads. First, £5,037 1s 2d. This was a claim for loss of time. The charterers said that, by reason of the master's refusal, they were deprived of the use of the vessel for a number of days and deducted that sum from the hire payable by them. Second, £4,319 11s 1d. These were expenses to which the charterers were put because of the master's refusal. I expect the vessel had to go to some other port, or to unload into lighters.
- The shipowners relied on an exemption clause in answer to the claim. The umpire made his award in these words:

'I award and adjudge (a) that, although the [shipowners] have failed to justify the refusal of the Master to enter the port of Ampala, they have established that they are fully protected by the exemption clause in the charterparty and that therefore the [charterers] fail in toto ...'

The parties did not ask for a case stated. The charterers now say that the award is bad in law on the face of it. The exemption clause is not set out in the award, but for the present purposes it is accepted that we can look at it. The exemption clause is cl 13. It goes back a very long time. The only case where it has been considered before is *Owner of Steamship Istros v F W Dahlstroem & Co*¹. It can be divided into four sentences:

First

'The Owners only to be responsible for delay in delivery of the Vessel or for delay during the currency of the Charter and for loss or damage to goods on board if such delay or loss has been caused by want of due diligence on the part of the Owners or their Manager in making the Vessel seaworthy and fitted for the voyage or any other personal act or omission or default of the Owners or their Manager.'

Second

'The Owners not to be responsible in any other case nor for damage or delay whatsoever and howsoever caused even if caused by the neglect or default of their servants.'

Third

'The Owners not to be liable for loss or damage arising or resulting from strikes, lock-outs or stoppage or restraint of labour (including the Master, Officers or Crew) whether partial or general.'

Fourth

'The Charterers to be responsible for loss or damage caused to the Vessel or to the Owners by goods being loaded contrary to the terms of the Charter or by improper or careless bunkering or loading, stowing or discharging of goods or any other improper or negligent act on their part or that of their servants.'

The first sentence makes the owners responsible for certain specified types of delay or loss or damage when it is due to the personal default of the owners or their manager. The first part of the second sentence says that the owners are not to be responsible for those specified types 'in any other case', i.e. when it is not due to the personal default of the owners or their manager. Seeing that the delay or loss or damage here does not come within those specified types, those parts of the clause do not come into question here.

The second part of the second sentence states: '... nor for damage or delay whatsoever and howsoever caused even if caused by the neglect or default of their servants.' This is the part here in question. The shipowners say that they were exempt from liability for both heads of claim here. The principal contest is as to the word 'damage'. Counsel for the charterers has urged that that refers only to physical damage. It takes its colour, he says, from the words in the first sentence 'damage to goods on board'. Counsel for the shipowners says that 'damage' refers not only to physical damage but also to financial loss or damage. He points out that in the third and fourth sentences 'damage' clearly includes financial loss and damage.

The Gencon charter contains words which are somewhat similar. It says: '... the owners are responsible for no loss or damage or delay arising from any other cause whatsoever.' These words were construed by Diplock J in *Louis Dreyfus et Cie v Parnaso Cia Naviera SA*². He held that they relate to loss of, or damage to the goods, or delay in delivery of the goods. But he based his judgment on the context in which those words occurred, especially the first paragraph of that clause in the Gencon a charter. It is interesting to notice that Diplock J³ indicates that it might have been different if the words had been 'no loss or damage or delay whatsoever'.

In the present clause in the Baltime charter, it seems to me that the second part of the sentence goes beyond the specified types which have been previously mentioned. The words 'damage or delay whatsoever and howsoever caused' mean damage of any kind whatsoever, including therein not only physical damage but also financial loss. The learned judge took this view, and I agree with him. The word 'damage'

b exempts the shipowners from the whole of the claim, both the loss of time and also the expenses.

It is unnecessary, therefore, to go into the meaning of the word 'delay' which follows 'damage'. Counsel for the charterers used it in his argument to show that 'damage' was not as comprehensive as I have mentioned; but one knows that in documents of this kind there is a good deal of repetition or overlapping; and that is

c so here. If it had been necessary to tell whether this claim was a claim for 'delay' or whether it was a claim for refusal to obey the charterers' orders, there might be quite a nice argument. But, from my point of view, I think the word 'damage' is wide enough to cover both the heads of claim in this case. At any rate, I do not see any grounds for saying that the umpire erred in law in so construing it.

d I, therefore, would dismiss the appeal.

CAIRNS LJ. I agree.

The construction of this clause is made difficult for two main reasons: first, that on any construction there is a certain amount of surplusage in words; and, secondly, that while the word 'damage' is certainly used in the first sentence of the clause as

e meaning physical damage to goods, it is certainly used in a wider sense in the fourth sentence, and it is probably used in a wider sense in the third sentence. The issue here is what it means in the second part of the second sentence. The striking feature, however, of the second part of the second sentence is that the word 'damage' is there linked with the words 'whatsoever and howsoever caused'; and, taking those words

f into account, I reach the same conclusion as Lord Denning MR, that 'damage' is to be construed widely in this second half of the second sentence, not limited to physical damage to goods; and accordingly in my opinion the learned judge reached a right decision on the construction and the appeal should be dismissed.

ROSKILL LJ. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed, and I only add a very few words out of respect for counsel for the charterers' argument. There are two

g points in this case which I should mention. First, for my part I feel somewhat disturbed at the course adopted before Mocatta J in that, notwithstanding the form of the award of the very experienced umpire, it was apparently agreed by counsel and the learned judge that the judge might look at cl 13 of the Baltime charter. The judge thought that it was sufficient for him to look only at that clause. In the event, of course, he was right in that view. But, with great respect to him, it cannot

h be right in principle for a court, if it is to look at all at a document which is alleged to be incorporated in an award, to look only at part of that document. The matter, however, goes rather further than that. Counsel for the charterers referred to the well-known case of *F R Absalom Ltd v Great Western (London) Garden Village Society Ltd*⁴ as justifying the court looking at the whole charterparty including cl 13. The matter was not argued before us at any length, but it seems to me that, having regard to the j form of the award, it is extremely doubtful whether it was proper in the circumstances to look at either the charterparty or that clause at all, particularly having regard to the earlier decision of the Judicial Committee in *Champsey Bhara & Co v Jivraj Balloo Spinning and Weaving Co Ltd*⁵ and also to the decision of this court in

*D S Blaiber & Co Ltd v Leopold Newborne (London) Ltd*⁶. I refer in particular to the judgment of Denning LJ⁷. I only mention this lest otherwise the course adopted in this case should be thought to be the practice of the Commercial Court. What was done here must not become, as it were, the thin end of a judicial wedge, permitting an attack on the sanctity of arbitrators' and umpires' awards, particularly when neither party has seen fit to ask for a special case. It would have been much better, as Mocatta J pointed out, if it had been wished to raise the point of construction of cl 13, that it should be raised by way of a special case stated for the decision of the court and not ex post facto, on a motion to set aside the award for alleged error of law, a motion which in my judgment fails. I turn to deal with the second matter.

The real issue is the meaning if the word 'damage' in line 99 of the charterparty. Counsel for the charterers has argued that it has a narrow meaning, saying that it takes its colour from the preceding language of the clause. Counsel for the shipowners, on the other hand, has said it has a wide meaning, and that notwithstanding the meaning of the word earlier in the clause, nevertheless 'damage' in line 99 is wide enough to cover not only physical loss and damage, but also financial loss of any kind. The point is not entirely easy. It is for the shipowner to bring himself clearly within any exception on which he seeks to rely. But when one looks at the pattern of this clause, it seems to me that counsel for the shipowners is right when he says that the object of the clause is to establish a mutual code of shipowners' and charterers' responsibilities—not only for physical loss or damage, but for other kinds of loss and damage as well whether physical or financial. It is true that the clause is not very happily drawn. It starts by accepting liability for certain specified types of loss and damage. It then goes on to exclude certain other types of loss and damage. Not surprisingly, having regard to the somewhat illogical order of the clause, trouble arises when one has to decide whether the word 'damage' in line 99 of the charterparty would have a wide or a narrow construction; but, having regard to the general nature of this clause and the obvious intent to protect the shipowner as far as possible from claims other than claims of the kind and description which fall specifically within the words of the first sentence of the clause, I agree that the word 'damage' should be given a wide meaning and that it does not in any way extend its natural meaning too widely to give it the meaning for which the shipowners contend. It is not necessary in these circumstances to express any concluded view on the meaning of 'delay'. I see great force in counsel for the charterers' argument on this issue, but it seems to me that on the skeleton facts set out in the award on which it is sought to set it aside, it is impossible to form any view whether the relevant claim would or would not fall within the exception of 'delay'.

For these reasons I agree with the learned judge and the umpire: I think they both reached the right conclusion, and I agree that the appeal fails for the reasons Lord Denning MR and Cairns LJ have given.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SALMON, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJJ

21ST, 22ND OCTOBER 1971

- ^b Surtax – Settlement – Treatment of income as settlor's income – Discretionary power for benefit of settlor or spouse of settlor – Adjustment to exclude power – Settlor's wife included in specified class of beneficiaries – Power of appointment in favour of one or more of specified class other than wife in settlor's lifetime – Power to appoint any person other than settlor member of specified class with written consent of settlor – Purported exercise of power of appointment in favour of members of specified class – Appointment resettling capital 'upon the like trusts' subject to the omission of wife or widow from specified class – Validity of appointment – Effect – Whether power remaining to appoint wife to specified class – Whether power remaining to pay or apply for benefit of wife any part of income or property – Finance Act 1958, s 22 (1), (5).

- ^d Settlement – Trust – Uncertainty – Certainty of objects – Power of selection – Bare power not coupled with a trust – Settlement containing discretionary trusts in favour of specified class of beneficiaries – Power of trustees with written consent of settlor to include 'any other person or persons except the settlor' in the specified class – Whether power void for uncertainty.

Power of appointment – Exercise – Validity – Settlement – Discretionary trusts in favour of specified class of beneficiaries – Power to appoint that capital should be held on trust for any one of specified class – Specified class including settlor's wife or widow – Appointment of capital to be held on settlement trusts subject to the exclusion of settlor's wife or widow from specified class – Validity of appointment.

- ^e In 1956 the taxpayer made a settlement containing discretionary trusts for the benefit of members of a specified class which included the taxpayer's 'wife [or] widow'. The trustees were to apply the income of the trust fund for the maintenance, support or benefit of any one or more of the specified class in such manner and such proportions as they thought fit. The settlement conferred power on the trustees during the trust period to pay or apply capital of the trust fund to or for the benefit of any one or more of the specified class, and also power to appoint in writing 'that the whole or any part or parts of such capital shall be held upon such trusts (either revocable or irrevocable) for the benefit of any one or more of the specified class (but not so as to confer any benefit during the lifetime of the [taxpayer] in the capital or income of the Trust Fund upon the wife of the [taxpayer]) ...' Paragraph 5 of Sch 2 to the deed provided: 'The Trustees may with the previous consent in writing of the [taxpayer] appoint that any other person or persons except the [taxpayer] shall be included in the Specified Class ...' The settlement therefore fell within the terms of s 22 (1)^a of the Finance Act 1958 in that the taxpayer's wife was included in the class of beneficiaries, and thus rendered the taxpayer liable to surtax on the settlement income. Section 22 (5)^a of the 1958 Act however allowed the trustees by making

- ^a Section 22, so far as material, provides: '(1) If and so long as the terms of any settlement ... are such that any person has or may have power, whether immediately or in the future, and whether with or without the consent of any person—(a) to pay or apply to or for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor the whole or any part of the income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in the settlement ... being a power exercisable at his discretion, any income arising under the settlement in any year of assessment ... shall ... be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for that year ... (5) Where, in the case of any settlement made before the ninth day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty-eight, any income arising under the settlement would, by virtue of the foregoing provisions of this section, appropriate adjustments to the settlement within a specified period to escape the charge imposed by s 22 (1). In order to take advantage of s 22 (5) the trustees under their power contained in the settlement irrevocably appointed that all the capital of the trust fund should be held on the like trusts and subject to the like powers and provisions as in the settlement save (a) that in the definition of the specified class the words 'wife widow' should be deemed to have been omitted and (b) that the words 'and the widow of the [taxpayer]' should be inserted after the words 'the specified class' in the power to advance capital and in the power of appointment. In the High Court^b it was held that despite the purported exercise of the power of appointment the trustees still had, or might have, power, whether immediately or in the future and whether with or without the consent of any person, to pay or apply to or for the benefit of the taxpayer's wife the whole or any part of the income or capital of trust fund since (a) the appointment was not a valid exercise of the power and wholly failed, and (b) even if the appointment were valid the trustees still had power under para 5 of Sch 2 to the settlement to reintroduce the taxpayer's wife into the specified class; accordingly, by virtue of s 22 (1) of the 1958 Act, the taxpayer was assessable to surtax on the basis that the income of the trust fund was to be treated as his income. The taxpayer appealed.

(i) although the immediate effect of the appointment was merely to exclude the taxpayer's wife from the objects of the discretionary trusts of the income, what was done was something that was clearly within the terms of the power of appointment; an appointment resettling trust funds on trusts identical with the existing trusts but excluding a particular power in the trustees was a good exercise of the power (see p 47 f to p 48 a and p 51 g, post); Muir v Inland Revenue Comrs [1966] 3 All ER 38 applied;

(ii) in the context of the appointment, the effect of which was to redeclare the trusts of the settlement subject to the modification stated and with the express embargo on any appointment which would confer any benefit on the taxpayer's wife during his lifetime, the power of the trustees under para 5 of Sch 2 to appoint that any person, other than the taxpayer, should be a member of the specified class, must be read as subject to the qualification that the trustees could not properly exercise the power so as to reintroduce the taxpayer's wife to the specified class during his lifetime, for such an exercise would be clearly contrary to the whole scheme and intention of the beneficial trusts as recast by the appointment; furthermore, since the power could only be exercised with the taxpayer's consent and in the circumstances it was inconceivable that he would consent to the reintroduction of his wife to the specified class in his lifetime, thereby defeating the object of avoiding liability to surtax on his income, the appointment did not have the effect of giving the trustees power to confer a benefit on the taxpayer's wife in the future by reintroducing her to the specified class (see p 48 j to p 49 e, p 51 g and p 52 g to p 53 b, post).

Per Curiam. It was not open to the taxpayer to argue that the power contained in para 5 of Sch 2 to the settlement was void for uncertainty. The power was not one which the trustees were under a duty to exercise; it was a power the exercise of which they were under a duty to consider from time to time. If the class of persons fall to be treated . . . as the income of the settlor . . . but would not fall to be so treated apart from those provisions, it shall not be so treated if—(a) no power by reason of which it would fall to be so treated has been exercised after the eighth day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty-eight, or is or can become exercisable after the fifth day of April, nineteen hundred and fifty-nine, or such later date as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may in any particular case allow; and (b) neither the settlor nor the wife or husband of the settlor has received or is entitled to any consideration or benefit in connection with the fulfilment of the condition set out in paragraph (a) of this subsection.

- a* to whose possible claims they would have to give consideration were so wide that it really did not amount to a class in any true sense at all, that would be a duty which it would be impossible for them to perform and the power would be invalid on that ground. Although the trustees had power to introduce to the class any person other than the taxpayer, that power could only be exercised with the written consent of the taxpayer and hence only during his lifetime. It could not therefore be said that the taxpayer had failed to set any metes and bounds to the beneficial interests which he intended to create or permit to be created under the settlement (see p 50 d to f and p 51 g, post).

Appeal

- The taxpayer, Cyril Blausten, appealed to the Special Commissioners of Income Tax against the following assessments to surtax: 1961-62 £1,824; 1962-63 £5,871; 1963-64 £5,863. The question for decision was whether income of a trust created by a deed of settlement dated 19th July 1956 and made between the taxpayer and the trustees (Malcolm Slowe and others), having regard to the terms of a deed of appointment supplemental thereto dated 19th January 1959, was required by virtue of the provisions of s 22 of the Finance Act 1958 (relating to settlements containing a discretionary power for the benefit of the settlor etc) to be treated as income of the taxpayer for surtax purposes.
- h*

The settlement recited:

- j* '(A) The [taxpayer] has immediately before the execution hereof paid to the Trustees the sum of One hundred pounds and has transferred to the Trustees the investments specified in the First Schedule hereto
- '(B) In this Settlement "the specified class" means the persons for the time being alive and included amongst the persons and classes of persons specified in the Second Schedule hereto

(C) The [taxpayer] is desirous of making provision for the specified class in manner hereinafter appearing and for this purpose has irrevocably directed the Trustees to hold the said sum and said investments upon the trusts declared by this Settlement concerning the same' a and provided: 'THIS DEED made in consideration of the natural love and affection of the [taxpayer] WITNESSETH' (inter alia) as follows:

'1. THE Trustees shall henceforth stand possessed of the said sum and said investments and all other the property from time to time representing the same or otherwise subject to the trusts hereof (all of which are hereinafter collectively referred to as "the Trust Fund") upon trust . . . b

'2. THE Trustees shall hold the Trust Fund on the trusts following namely:—

'(A) During the period commencing on the date hereof and ending on the expiration of twenty years after the death of the last survivor of all the persons now living who are either members of the specified class or lineal descendants of His late Majesty King George V (which period is hereinafter called "the Trust Period") the Trustees shall pay divide or apply the income of the Trust Fund to or between or for the maintenance support or benefit of all or any one or more of the specified class in such proportions and in such manner as the Trustees shall in their uncontrolled discretion think fit PROVIDED ALWAYS that the Trustees may at any time or times during the Trust Period if in their uncontrolled discretion they think fit pay or apply the whole or any part or parts of the capital of the Trust Fund to or for the benefit of any one or more of the specified class or in writing appoint that the whole or any part or parts of such capital shall be held upon such trusts (either revocable or irrevocable) for the benefit of any one or more of the specified class (but not so as to confer any benefit during the lifetime of the [taxpayer] in the capital or income of the Trust Fund upon the wife of the [taxpayer]) and subject to such powers and discretions exercisable by any person or persons (other than the [taxpayer] acting solely) and generally in such manner as the Trustees shall think fit but so that all interests so created shall vest within the Trust Period c

'(B) Subject to the trusts aforesaid the Trustees shall hold the Trust Fund in trust as to both capital and income for the children of the [taxpayer] living at the date of this Settlement in equal shares as an accretion to their respective residuary estates.' d

Schedule 2 (the heading of which was 'THE SPECIFIED CLASS') was as follows:

'1. The wife widow children and remoter issue of the [taxpayer]. 2. The brothers and sisters of the [taxpayer] and their respective children and remoter issue. 3. The spouses widows and widowers of any of the children and remoter issue aforesaid. 4. For the purpose of the foregoing provisions:—(a) A widow or widower shall not become excluded therefrom by reason of any remarriage; and (b) A child shall be deemed to include a stepchild and an adopted child and "children" and "remoter issue" shall be construed accordingly. 5. The Trustees may with the previous consent in writing of the [taxpayer] appoint that any other person or persons except the [taxpayer] shall be included in the Specified Class as from the date of any such appointment the person or persons specified therein shall be included accordingly.' e

The appointment recited:

'(A) By Clause 2 (a) of the Settlement it is inter alia provided that the Trustees thereof may (subject as therein mentioned) in writing appoint that the whole or any part of the funds subject to the trusts thereof shall be held upon such revocable or irrevocable trusts for the benefit of the specified class (as defined by the Settlement) or any of them and subject to such powers and discretions and generally in such manner as such Trustees shall think fit f

- a* (B) The Appointors are the present Trustees of the Settlement and have determined to make such irrevocable declaration and appointment as is hereinafter contained' and provided:

- b* 'THIS DEED WITNESSETH and the Trustees hereby irrevocably declare and appoint that henceforth and until the expiration of the Trust Period as defined in the said Clause 2 (a) of the Settlement all the property from time to time representing the capital subject to the trusts of the Settlement (hereinafter called "the Trust Fund") shall be held upon the like trusts and with and subject to the like powers and provisions as are declared and contained in the Settlement in all respects as if the same were herein repeated save only that:—(a) In the definition of the specified class contained in the Schedule to the Settlement the words "wife widow" shall be deemed to have been omitted; and (b) In clause 2 (a) of the Settlement there shall be deemed to have been inserted after the words "the specified class" where those words occur for the third and fourth times the words "and the widow of the [taxpayer]".'
- c*

- d* It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer: (1) that in ascertaining the scope of the power of inclusion in the specified class under para 5 of Sch 2 regard should be had to the terms of the settlement as originally made, without reference to the provisions contained in the appointment; (2) that accordingly the provisions contained in sub-para (a) of the appointment as to the omission of the words 'wife widow' in the definition of the specified class contained in the schedule did not have the effect of widening the scope of para 5 thereof so as to enable the trustees with the consent in writing of the taxpayer to appoint that his wife (as being within the words 'any other person or persons') be included in the specified class; (3) that any appointment purporting to include the wife of the taxpayer in the specified class would be an excessive use of the powers of the trustees and, therefore, void in that respect; (4) that the provisions of s 22 of the 1958 Act were not therefore applicable to the settlement for the relevant years

- f* It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (1) that in ascertaining the scope of the power of inclusion in the specified class under para 5 of Sch 2 regard should be had to the terms of the schedule as modified by the provisions of the appointment; (2) that the provisions contained in sub-para (a) of the appointment as to the omission of the words 'wife widow' in the definition of the specified class contained in the schedule had the effect consequentially of bringing the wife within the scope of para 5 and so empowered the trustees with the consent in writing of the taxpayer to appoint under that paragraph that his wife (as being within the words 'any other person or persons') be included in the specified class; (3) that any such appointment would be a competent exercise of the powers of the trustees; (4) that the provisions of s 22 of the Finance Act 1958 were therefore applicable to the settlement for the relevant years; (5) alternatively, that if the appointment went beyond the terms of cl 2 (A) of the settlement because it did confer a benefit 'during the lifetime of the [taxpayer] in the capital or income of the Trust Fund upon the wife of the [taxpayer]', the appointment would be invalid and the position would fall to be considered on the terms of the settlement alone, and that in that event the provisions of s 22 would likewise be applicable.
- g*
- h*

The commissioners' decision was as follows:

- j* 'We the Commissioners who heard the appeal were of opinion that the Appointment did not go beyond the power of appointment conferred by the Settlement and that it was not accordingly invalid. As to the effect of the Appointment, we considered that on a proper construction of the provisions thereof it required the specified class as set out in the above-mentioned Second Schedule to be ascertained as if the words "wife widow" in paragraph 1 of that

Schedule had been omitted, with such consequential effect as that might have on subsequent provisions of the Schedule, and accordingly that after the making of the Appointment the words "any other person or persons" in paragraph 5 of the Schedule fell to be construed as including the wife of the [taxpayer].'

They held therefore that in principle the appeal failed, and on the basis of that decision adjusted the assessments as follows: 1961-62 £1,798; 1962-63 £5,560; 1963-64 £5,659.

On 5th July 1971 as reported, at [1971] 3 All ER 1085, Goff J dismissed the taxpayer's appeal by way of case stated against that decision. The taxpayer appealed to the Court of Appeal.

J E Vinelott QC and S J L Oliver for the taxpayer.

B L Bathurst QC and P W Medd for the Crown.

BUCKLEY LJ delivered the first judgment at the invitation of Salmon LJ. This is an appeal against a decision of Goff J¹ affirming a decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax who had upheld assessments to surtax on the appellant taxpayer in respect of the fiscal years 1961-62 to 1963-64 inclusive. The assessments were made under the provisions of the Finance Act 1958, s 22, and were rightly made if, on the facts, it was the case that by the terms of the relevant settlement in the relevant years the trustees of the settlement had or might have power whether immediately or in the future and whether with or without the consent of any person to pay or apply to or for the benefit of the taxpayer's wife the whole or any part of the income or capital of the trust fund.

The taxpayer made a settlement in July 1956, the relevant terms of which are set out in the case stated², and of the beneficial trusts the first was a discretionary trust of income for the members of a specified class during a specified trust period of considerable duration. Particulars of the specified class in question were set out in Sch 2 to the settlement and that class included the wife or widow of the taxpayer. The next provision in the beneficial trusts is a power in cl 2 (A) for the trustees during the trust period to pay or apply capital of the trust fund to or for the benefit of any one or more of the specified class and that is followed by a power of appointment conferred on the trustees, which is of importance in the case, in the following terms:

'... or in writing appoint that the whole or any part or parts of such capital shall be held upon such trusts (either revocable or irrevocable) for the benefit of any one or more of the specified class (but not so as to confer any benefit during the lifetime of the [taxpayer] in the capital or income of the Trust Fund upon the wife of the [taxpayer]) and subject to such powers and discretions exercisable by any person or persons (other than the [taxpayer] acting solely) and generally in such manner as the Trustees shall think fit but so that all interests so created shall vest within the Trust Period.'

Then there follows an ultimate trust of the capital and income of the trust fund for the children of the settlor living at the date of the settlement in equal shares. It has been questioned whether the words in parenthesis in the power of appointment which I have read qualify only the power of appointment or whether they also qualify the power to advance capital, but nothing I think turns on that.

Schedule 2 to the deed, headed 'THE SPECIFIED CLASS', contains the following in para 5:

'The Trustees may with the previous consent in writing of the [taxpayer] appoint that any other person or persons except the [taxpayer] shall be included

² See pp 43, 44, ante

- a in the Specified Class and as from the date of any such appointment the person or persons specified therein shall be included accordingly.'

After the enactment of the Finance Act 1958, and with the fairly clear intention of taking the benefit of s 22 (5), the trustees executed an appointment, and by that deed, which was expressed to be made under the power contained in cl 2 (A) of the settlement which is the power of appointment to which I have referred, the trustees

b irrevocably appointed that thenceforth until the expiration of the trust period all the property from time to time representing the capital of the trust fund should be held on the like trusts and with and subject to the like powers and provisions as were declared and contained in the settlement in all respects as if the same were therein repeated, save only that (a) in the definition of the specified class contained in Sch 2 to the settlement the words 'wife widow' should be deemed to have been

c omitted and (b) in cl 2 (A) of the settlement there should be deemed to have been inserted after the words 'the specified class' where those words occur in the power to advance capital and in the power of appointment but not elsewhere the words 'and the widow of the [taxpayer]'.

The question for consideration is whether in the three fiscal years in question in that state of affairs the case is one which falls within the terms of s 22 or not. The d learned judge disposed of the case on a point which had not been raised before the Special Commissioners at all, which he shortly expressed in these terms³:

'In my judgment, the appointment was not effective at all. I do not think that an appointment of the capital on the like trusts and with and subject to the like powers and provisions as were declared and contained in the settlement,

e with the two modifications specified, was really an appointment of the capital for the benefit of any one or more of the specified class at all. It was really simply an attempt to delete members from the specified class, which there was no power to do, and then to read in the widow of the taxpayer as a possible object of the discretionary trust, leaving her still with nothing but a spes.'

f The appointment was in terms a resettlement on new trusts of the capital of the trust fund. The new trusts were trusts which were declared referentially by reference to the settlement, but they differed in the particular respects stated in the appointment from the trusts of the settlement. The appointment was only to operate during the trust period and it is I think right that the only operative effect of the appointment was to take the taxpayer's wife out of the specified class for the purposes

g of the discretionary trust and of the power to advance capital and of the power of appointment and to restore her to the class of persons in whose favour capital could be advanced or benefits could be conferred under an appointment as from the time when she might become the widow of the testator. The immediate effect was to exclude her from the objects of the discretionary trusts of the income and that was clearly one of the major objectives of the exercise.

h In my judgment, however, what was done by the deed of appointment was something which was clearly within the terms of the power of appointment. It was an appointment under which the capital was directed to be held on trusts for the benefit of members of the specified class and, although the objective of the trustees in making the appointment may not have been the kind of objective which the taxpayer had in mind when he conferred the power of appointment on the trustees, the i appointment nevertheless in my judgment falls within the power.

A rather similar question was considered in the Court of Appeal in *Muir v Inland Revenue Comrs*⁴ and this court came to the conclusion that a resettlement of the trust fund in that case on trusts identical with the existing trusts but excluding a particular power in the trustees was a good exercise of the power. Similarly in the present case in my judgment this appointment was a good exercise of power and accordingly I do not feel able to agree with the view which the learned judge⁵ took in the passage which I have read. a

It is necessary, therefore, to consider what the effect of the appointment was and its relevance to s 22 of the Act of 1958. Before the Special Commissioners an initial point was taken which is no longer pursued and which I need do no more than state fairly shortly. It was argued before them that in the settlement in its original form 'other person or persons' in para 5 could not have included the taxpayer's wife because she was a member of the specified class; so in the referential trusts declared by the deed of appointment para 5 should be construed in precisely the same sense and the taxpayer's wife should not be treated as being within the class of persons who might be introduced into the specified class under that power. That argument, as I say, is no longer pursued and I think rightly no longer pursued, for I do not think it could be a valid argument. b

The next point which is taken by the taxpayer is this. Counsel for the taxpayer draws attention to the fact that the power of appointment itself is subject to the qualification contained in the words in parenthesis: c

'(but not so as to confer any benefit during the lifetime of the [taxpayer] in the capital or income of the Trust Fund upon the wife of the [taxpayer])'.

Counsel says having regard to the circumstances in which the appointment was made and the clear intention to avoid liability to tax under s 22 of the Finance Act 1958, the appointment must be construed in such a way as to exclude the wife of the taxpayer during his lifetime from any benefit; and so para 5 of Sch 2 as incorporated in the referential trusts declared by the appointment must be construed as subject to a qualification that no benefit shall be conferred on the taxpayer's wife under that power during his lifetime. d

As an alternative argument counsel for the taxpayer says that, if the effect of the appointment was to confer a benefit on the taxpayer's wife by including her in the class of persons who might be added to the specified class under the power contained in para 5 of Sch 2, then the appointment was in excess of the power because the power was subject to an express qualification in that respect. He says that the excess appointment is a severable element of the appointment and that the appointment so far as excessive is bad but so far as permissible remains good. On one or other of those grounds he contends that para 5 of Sch 2 as redeclared in the new trusts set up by the appointment must be construed in such a way as to exclude any possibility that the trustees should reintroduce the taxpayer's wife into the specified class. e

For myself I find some difficulty in saying that when the trustees by the appointment conferred on themselves the power which is contained in para 5 of the settlement they were conferring any benefit on the wife within the meaning of the word 'benefit' in the words in parenthesis in the power of appointment. The wife might have benefited had the trustees reintroduced her to the specified class but by conferring on themselves the power in para 5, if it is to be read in the full extent of its language, the trustees were conferring on themselves a power to confer a benefit on the taxpayer's wife, but were not at that stage conferring any benefit on her. But it should be appreciated that the effect of the appointment was to redeclare all the trusts of the settlement, subject only to the modifications stated in the deed of appointment, and so in those trusts one would find, first, a discretionary trust for members of the specified class, which initially at any rate must exclude the taxpayer's wife; then a power to advance capital to members of the specified class and the taxpayer's widow; then a power to appoint the whole or any part of the capital on trust for the benefit f a of members of the specified class and the taxpayer's widow with an express embargo placed on any appointment which would confer any benefit during the lifetime of the taxpayer on his wife; and then the ultimate trusts in favour of the children of the taxpayer.

b Now in that context it seems to me to be clear that the power of the trustees under para 5 in Sch 2 to appoint that any person other than the members of the specified class as constituted by the deed of appointment, except the taxpayer, should be included in the specified class must be read as subject to this qualification, that that power is one which the trustees could not properly exercise in such a way, as to reintroduce the taxpayer's wife to the specified class during his lifetime, because such an exercise of the power would, as it seems to me, be clearly contrary to the whole scheme and intention of the beneficial trusts as recast by the appointment.

c So, although for myself I do not think it is right to say that one can as a matter of semantics construe the words 'other person or persons' in para 5 of Sch 2 as it is found in the trusts set up by the appointment as excluding the taxpayer's wife, I think one does find a context which makes it clear that the power conferred on the trustees was one which they could not properly exercise in such a way as to reintroduce the taxpayer's wife to the specified class. Moreover, it is to be observed that the power is one which could only be exercised with the previous consent in writing of the taxpayer, and in the circumstances of the case it seems to me inconceivable that the taxpayer would have consented to the reintroduction of his wife to the specified class in his own lifetime; for it is clear that the object of this exercise was to take advantage of the escape route which was permitted under s 22 (5) of the Act of 1958 and such a course would have defeated that object. So that as a matter of construction in that way I reach the conclusion that the appointment did not have the effect of giving the trustees power to confer a benefit on the taxpayer's wife in the future by reintroducing her to the specified class. That is, I think sufficient to dispose of the case.

e However, a further point has been argued and it is this. It is said that the power which is found in para 5 of Sch 2 is so wide that it is bad for uncertainty. I should perhaps say a word on that part of the argument which has been addressed to us. f It is said that, where a power is given to trustees by virtue of their office, they are under a duty to consider from time to time whether they should exercise it, and that such consideration is impossible where the power is of such a wide nature as this which, it is suggested, would enable the trustees to propose to include in the specified class anyone in the world.

g In that connection we have been referred to a number of authorities including Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts, *Whishaw v Stephens*⁶, and the more recent decision of the House of Lords in *McPhail v Doulton*⁷. In the latter case the House of Lords has laid down that questions of validity depend on the same or similar tests whether the provision under consideration is a power or a trust. Lord Wilberforce in his speech said this⁸:

h 'The conclusion which I would reach, implicit in the previous discussion, is that the wide distinction between the validity test for powers and that for trust powers, is unfortunate and wrong, that the rule recently fastened on the courts by *Inland Revenue Comrs v Broadway Cottages Trust*⁹ ought to be discarded, and that the test for the validity of trust powers ought to be similar to that accepted by this House in *Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts*⁶ for powers, namely that the trust is valid if it can be said with certainty that any given individual is or is not a member of the class.'

Later Lord Wilberforce said¹⁰:

'Assimilation of the validity test does not involve the complete assimilation of trust powers with powers. As to powers, I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Upjohn in *Re Gulbenkian's Settlement*¹¹ that although the trustees may, and normally will, be under a fiduciary duty to consider whether or in what way they should exercise their power, the court will not normally compel its exercise. It will intervene if the trustees exceed their powers, and possibly if they are proved to have exercised it capriciously. But in the case of a trust power, if the trustees do not exercise it, the court will: I respectfully adopt as to this the statement in Lord Upjohn's opinion [in the Gulbenkian case¹²]. I would venture to amplify this by saying that the court, if called on to execute the trust power, will do so in the manner best calculated to give effect to the settlor's or testator's intentions.'

Then Lord Wilberforce went on to explain how that might be done.

Now the power in para 5 of Sch 2 to the settlement is certainly given to the trustees virtute officii, but it is not in my judgment a power which they are under a duty to exercise. It is a power the exercise of which they are under a duty to consider from time to time. If the class of persons to whose possible claims they would have to give consideration were so wide that it really did not amount to a class in any true sense at all no doubt that would be a duty which it would be impossible for them to perform and the power could be said to be invalid on that ground. But here, although they may introduce to the specified class any other person or persons except the taxpayer, the power is one which can only be exercised with the previous consent in writing of the taxpayer and, perhaps I may say in parenthesis, in my judgment could only be exercised in the lifetime of the taxpayer. Therefore on analysis the power is not a power to introduce anyone in the world to the specified class, but only anyone proposed by the trustees and approved by the taxpayer. This is not a case in which it could be said that the taxpayer in this respect has not set any metes and bounds to the beneficial interests which he intended to create or permit to be created under this settlement.

We were referred to what was said by Clauson J in *Re Park, Public Trustee v Armstrong*¹³:

'It is clearly settled that if a testator creates a trust he must mark out the metes and bounds which are to fetter the trustees or, as has been said, the trust must not be too vague for the Court to enforce, and that is why a gift to trustees for such purposes as they may in their discretion think fit is an invalid trust; there are no metes and bounds within which the trust can be defined, and unless the trust can be defined the Court cannot enforce it.'

Here the taxpayer reserves to himself the power to say how far the trustees in exercise of their powers under para 5 can enlarge the class of beneficiaries and the only person who can be introduced into the class of beneficiaries is one approved by both the trustees and the taxpayer. In my judgment this is not a power which suffers from the sort of uncertainty which results from the trustees being given a power of so wide an extent that it would be impossible for the court to say whether or not they were properly exercising it and so wide that it would be impossible for the trustees to consider in any sensible manner how they should exercise it, if at all, from time to time. The trustees would no doubt take into consideration the possible claims of anyone having any claim on the beneficence of the taxpayer. That a is not a class of persons so wide or so indefinite that the trustees would not be able rationally to exercise their duty to consider from time to time whether or not they should exercise the power.

I might in this connection refer to a short further passage from the speech of Lord Wilberforce in *McPhail v Doulton*¹⁴, where he said:

b 'Two final points: first, as to the question of certainty, I desire to emphasise the distinction clearly made and explained by Lord Upjohn¹⁵, between linguistic or semantic uncertainty which, if unresolved by the court, renders the gift void, and the difficulty of ascertaining the existence or whereabouts of members of the class, a matter with which the court can appropriately deal on an application for directions. There may be a third case where the meaning of the words used is clear but the definition of beneficiaries is so hopelessly wide as not to form "anything like a class" so that the trust is administratively unworkable or in Lord Eldon LC's words one that cannot be executed (*Morice v Bishop of Durham*¹⁶). I hesitate to give examples for they may prejudice future cases, but perhaps "all the residents of Greater London" will serve. I do not think that a discretionary trust for "relatives" even of a living person falls within this category.'

d Earlier in his speech in passages which I will not read Lord Wilberforce had indicated the sort of way in which trustees could properly carry out their duty where they have to consider the claims of persons who fall within a very widely described class of a kind in respect of which it would be quite impossible to make a complete list of the members at any given time.

e In my judgment this power in para 5 of Sch 2 is not one which is bad for uncertainty. It is a power of a kind which I think the trustees could properly carry out with due regard to their fiduciary duty to give consideration to the question whether and how the power should be exercised from time to time, and it is a power which is framed in such a way that it makes it impossible to say that the taxpayer failed to set due metes and bounds to the benefits capable of arising under the trusts he has set up. So that had the matter not been one which I think falls to be disposed of on the earlier grounds I have discussed I should not have thought that this appeal should succeed on the uncertainty ground. But in my opinion it does succeed on the points which I discussed earlier as to the construction and effect to be given to the referential trusts set up by the deed of appointment read as a whole and on that ground I would allow this appeal.

g ORR LJ. I agree and do not wish to add anything.

SALMON LJ. I agree and I add a word only because we are differing from the learned judge¹⁷ and out of respect for the argument of counsel for the Crown. I propose to confine myself to the point on which, in my view, this appeal should be allowed.

h Counsel for the Crown has said that no doubt anybody can guess or indeed be reasonably sure that when the appointment of 19th January 1959 was made the trustees were seeking to take advantage of s 22 (5) of the Finance Act 1958. Nevertheless, says counsel, that is nihil ad rem because the taxpayer cannot succeed unless on a true construction of the appointment it can be shown that the trustees have no power to pay or apply for the benefit of the settlor's wife the whole or any part of the income of the property comprised in the settlement. I entirely accept that argument. It has been conceded by counsel for the taxpayer that the appointment which was made nearly 12 years ago, and for which neither he nor his learned junior had any responsibility, is hardly a miracle of felicitous draftsmanship. I would like to cite a passage from the speech of Lord Reid in Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts, *Whishaw v Stephens*¹⁸, where he said—

'the client must not be penalised for his lawyer's slovenly drafting. Under modern conditions it may be necessary to relax older and stricter standards. If I adopt methods of construction appropriate for commercial documents and documents inter rusticos I must consider whether underlying the words used any reasonably clear intention can be discerned.'

Counsel for the Crown quite rightly said that it is important to emphasise the phrase 'whether underlying the words used any reasonably clear intention can be discerned'. One has to look at the words used in their context and see what they really mean.

I do not propose to recite the passages in the settlement and the appointment to which Buckley LJ has already referred. Plainly the appointment constituted a resettlement under cl 2 (A) of the original settlement of all the capital and income comprised in that settlement and on the same terms save for amendments introduced by the appointment. In my judgment, it is crystal clear that the trustees when they made the appointment intended that the wife of the taxpayer should receive no benefit under the income trust during her husband's lifetime or even after he was dead and no capital benefit until after he was dead. This appointment was made in 1959 with the natural intention, as I understand is conceded, of taking advantage of the Act.

Looking at the terms of the original settlement which, as modified, are incorporated in the resettlement, it is plain that the intention was that the wife was to take no benefit. Now it is argued that that intention, which to my mind not only underlies the words used in the resettlement but is what those words plainly express, is stultified because para 5 is left in Sch 2. As I understand the argument it is said that the appointment creating the resettlement deletes the wife and widow in para 1 of Sch 2 and adds the words 'and the widow of the [taxpayer]' after the words 'the specified class' where they are mentioned thirdly and fourthly in cl 2 (A), i.e. in relation to the application of capital and resettlement of capital. The resettled property is held on the same trusts and subject to the same powers and provisions as are declared and contained in the original settlement in all respects as if the same were therein repeated save only in the respects to which I have referred. Counsel for the Crown contends correctly that para 5 of Sch 2 therefore survives in the resettlement effected by the appointment.

What is the true construction of para 5 in its new context? I agree with Buckley LJ that if trustees were to purport to exercise their powers under para 5 by adding the wife back in the class of possible beneficiaries it would be an improper exercise of their powers. For my part I would go further or perhaps merely put the point in a different way. Paragraph 5 as it appeared in the original settlement could not have had any reference to the wife or the widow because she was already one of the specified class by reason of para 1. Therefore one could not have added her as a person to be included in the specified class. She was already there. When para 5 is considered in the context of the resettlement, its language read literally is undoubtedly wide enough to allow the wife to be added to the specified class because she is 'any ... person ... except the [taxpayer]'. It is not uncommon however to apply a canon of construction which allows very general words to be given a restricted meaning if the context in which they are used clearly so requires. Here, in my view, the context does so require.

Since it seems to me that the clearest intention is expressed in the resettlement looked at as a whole that in no circumstances is the wife to take any benefit so far as income is concerned, and that as far as capital is concerned she is to take no benefit until after her husband's (the taxpayer's) death, i.e. until she ceases to be a wife and has become a widow, I for my part would hold that although the words of para 5 are wide enough to include the wife, they must on a fair construction be given a restricted meaning and read as excluding the wife. To my mind it is impossible to give effect to the intention of the trustees expressed in the document read as a whole without narrowing the meaning which could be attributed to the language of para 5 if it appeared in a different context. But it matters little whether one looks at it in that way or whether one says that having regard to the clear intention expressed in the resettlement read as a whole, the trustees would not properly exercise their powers under para 5 were they to add the wife to the specified class. I accordingly agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, BROWNE AND BRIDGE JJ

8th, 9th NOVEMBER 1971

Road traffic – Motorway – Restrictions on stopping – Vehicle remaining at rest on carriage-way – Meaning of ‘carriageway’ – Vehicle parked on hard shoulder of motorway – Hard shoulder part of ‘verge’ not carriageway – Hard shoulder distinguished from ‘marginal strip’ – Marginal strip part of carriageway – Motorways Traffic Regulations 1959 (SI 1959 No 1147), regs 3 (1) (a), (d), (h), 7 (1).

The appellant was found by the police in a parked car on the hard shoulder of a motorway. He was sitting in the car eating his sandwiches. Under the Motorways Traffic Regulations 1959 the hard shoulder was a place where motorists could only stop in certain defined emergencies. The appellant was charged with contravening reg 7 (1)^a of the 1959 regulations which prohibited a vehicle from stopping or remaining at rest on a carriageway. It was contended by the appellant that the hard shoulder was part of the ‘verge’ as defined by reg 3 (1) (h)^b of the 1959 regulations and not part of the ‘carriageway’ as defined by reg 3 (1) (a)^b and that accordingly he should have been charged under reg 9^c which prohibited vehicles from being driven, moved, stopped or remaining at rest on any verge. Before the justices it was accepted by all parties that the expression ‘marginal strip’, as defined in reg 3 (1) (d)^b, was intended to refer to the hard shoulder; the justices held that the marginal strip was part of the carriageway and accordingly convicted the appellant of the offence under reg 7 (1). On appeal, Held – Although the justices were correct in holding that, on the true construction of reg 3 (1) (d), the marginal strip was part of the carriageway, the expression ‘marginal strip’ referred not to the hard shoulder but to the white line which bordered the running surface of the nearside lane; the hard shoulder was part of the verge and not part of the carriageway; accordingly the appellant was wrongly convicted under reg 7 (1) and the appeal would be allowed (see p 56 b and p 57 f to h, post).

Case cited in argument

Stephenson v Johnson [1954] 1 All ER 369, [1954] 1 WLR 375.

Case stated

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county of Lancaster acting in and for the petty sessional division of Bolton in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Bolton on 3rd March 1971.

On 16th February 1971 an information was preferred by the respondent, John Desmond Rowland, an inspector of police, against the appellant, Hubert Wallwork, that he on 9th January 1971, at Westhoughton in the county of Lancaster did contravene reg 7 of the Motorways Traffic Regulations 1959 in that he did unlawfully cause a motor vehicle to remain at rest on the northbound carriageway of the M61 motorway, contrary to the regulation and s 13 of the Road Traffic Regulations Act 1967.

The following facts were found. At 1.00 pm on 9th January 1971 the motor vehicle JPP 116C was stationary on that part of the motorway known as the hard shoulder of the northbound carriageway of the M61 at Westhoughton. The M61 was a motorway to which the 1959 regulations applied. The appellant was seated in the front seat of the motor vehicle eating sandwiches. The motor vehicle was not stationary in any of the circumstances mentioned in reg 7 (2) of the 1959 regulations. At the point where the appellant's vehicle was stationary the motorway consisted of three lanes of carriageway for the use of vehicles travelling north, a hard shoulder and a grass verge. The surface of the road at the point where the appellant was stationary was constructed with a surface suitable for the passage of vehicular motor traffic along the motorway. The surface of the hard shoulder was of a different colour from the surface of the other three lanes. The appellant caused the motor vehicle to be stationary.

It was contended by the appellant that the information was wrong in law in that that part of a motorway known as the hard shoulder did not form part of the 'carriageway' within the meaning of reg 7, but was part of the 'verge' and accordingly the appellant should have been prosecuted for failure to conform to reg 9 of the 1959 regulations.

The justices were referred to the definition of 'marginal strip' in reg 3 (1) (d) which it was contended distinguished between the 'marginal strip' and the carriageway by reference to the surface colour and stated that the 'marginal strip' was 'at the side of that carriageway'. It was further contended that, by virtue of reg 3 (1) (h), the 'marginal strip' must therefore be part of the 'verge' as defined. (It was accepted that the marginal strip was not a central reservation.)

It was contended by the respondent that the term 'carriageway' was defined by reg 3 (1) (a) and that the marginal strip was within the term as there defined. It was contended that reg 3 (1) (a) must mean that the distinctive feature of a 'carriageway' was that each side consisted of either a marginal strip or a raised kerb; that in this case the nearside 'consisted of' a marginal strip and accordingly the marginal strip was part of the carriageway. It was further contended that the definition of 'marginal strip' stated that the marginal strip meant 'a narrow strip of the surface of a carriageway' and that the phrase 'which is at the side of the carriageway' was used not to distinguish the marginal strip from the carriageway but to indicate its position within the total width of the carriageway.

The justices were of the opinion that unless the context required otherwise the term 'carriageway' had to be construed in accordance with reg 3 (1) (a). They were a of the opinion that 'carriageway' as there defined stated that its distinctive feature was that one side consisted of a marginal strip (or a kerb) and whilst they found some difficulty in reconciling the definition of 'marginal strip' with this, such a reconciliation is possible on the construction contended for by the respondent. Accordingly they convicted the appellant of the offence as charged, for which offence he was adjudged to pay a fine of £5.

b The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether that part of a motorway known popularly as the 'hard shoulder' formed part of the carriageway for the purposes of reg 7 of the 1959 regulations.

N E Beppard for the appellant.

P B B Mayhew for the respondent.

c BRIDGE J delivered the first judgment at the invitation of Lord Widgery CJ. The appellant appeals against his conviction by Lancashire justices sitting at Bolton of an offence in contravention of the Motorways Traffic Regulations 1959¹. On 9th January 1971 the appellant was found by the police in a parked motor car on the hard shoulder of the northbound carriageway of the M61 motorway. He was sitting d in the motor car eating his sandwiches. There is no doubt whatever that there was a contravention of the relevant regulations. One is not allowed to have one's picnic on the hard shoulder of the motorway. On any construction of the regulations, the hard shoulder is a place where motorists can stop only in certain defined emergencies, and in this case there was no emergency. The question, and the only question, raised by the appeal is: which regulation was contravened.

e There are two candidates to be considered as the appropriate provision prohibiting the offence which the appellant committed. Regulation 7 (1) provides:

'Subject to the following provisions of this Regulation, no vehicle shall stop or remain at rest on a carriageway.'

Regulation 9 enacts that:

f 'No vehicle shall be driven or moved or stop or remain at rest on any verge except in accordance with paragraphs (2) and (3) of Regulation 7.'

These are the provisions which authorise stopping on the verge in an emergency.

g What happened here was that the prosecution charged the appellant with a contravention of reg 7. Before the justices and in this court it has been contended for the appellant that he was wrongly charged under reg 7 and should have been charged with contravening reg 9. In other words, the short point for our decision is simply whether, as the prosecution alleged and as the justices decided, the hard shoulder of the motorway is part of the 'carriageway' as defined in the regulations, or whether, as has throughout been contended on the part of the appellant, the hard shoulder is part of the 'verge'.

h I go to the definitions in reg 3 (1):

i '... (a) "carriageway" means that part of a motorway which is constructed with a surface suitable for the regular passage of vehicular motor traffic along the motorway and is distinguishable from the other parts of the motorway by the fact that on each side that part of the motorway either consists of a marginal strip or is contiguous to a raised kerb, but the said expression does not include any part of a central reservation ["Central reservation" is defined but nothing turns on it] ... (d) "marginal strip" means a continuous narrow strip of the surface of a carriageway which is at the side of that carriageway and is distinguishable from the rest of that surface by having a colour which is different from the colour of the rest of that surface; . . . (h) "verge" means any part of a motorway which is not a carriageway or a central reservation.' a

It is right to point out before going any further that it appears to have been assumed and accepted by all parties before the justices that the expression 'marginal strip' in the regulations was intended to refer to the hard shoulder. On the basis of that assumption it was nevertheless argued for the appellant before the justices that 'marginal strip' was not part of the carriageway. The justices in my judgment rightly rejected that argument. The language which I have just read defining 'carriageway' and 'marginal strip' makes it clear beyond doubt that the 'marginal strip', whatever that may be, is part of the carriageway. b

But in this court the argument for the appellant has proceeded on quite a different basis. Counsel for the appellant's submission is that the expression 'marginal strip' as defined in reg 3 is intended to refer not to the hard shoulder, but to what in layman's language one might call the white line which is to be found on any motorway bordering the nearside lane of the running surface of the motorway. It is true that there is no finding in the case as to the presence of such a white line at the relevant part of the M61, but counsel has invited us to look at a picture of a motorway which appears in the Highway Code², and to take judicial notice of what is common knowledge, and that is, I think, our own knowledge as to how motorways are constructed. c As I understand it, counsel for the respondent does not resist the submission that we may take judicial notice of a matter of this kind, and may recognise that motorways are constructed with a strip or line, generally rather wider than a lane line or hazard line, marking the near side edge of the running surface of a motorway, and in one sense one might say dividing the running part of the motorway from the hard shoulder. Approaching the matter on the basis that there was such a line here, then counsel for the appellant's submission, as I have said, is that it is to that line and to nothing else that the phrase 'marginal strip' in the regulations refers. Counsel for the respondent on the other hand submits that 'marginal strip' is a wholly inappropriate and incongruous expression to find the draftsman of legislation using to describe what can conveniently and appropriately be described as a white line or 'longitudinal line', which is the expression used in certain other regulations to which counsel for the respondent has drawn our attention. d e f

If the matter had to be resolved simply on a construction of the language used in the definition regulation, the arguments might be nicely balanced; but happily it does not have to be resolved on that basis alone. To see which construction is to be preferred, it is legitimate, and indeed right, to look at the operative provisions of these regulations, and see which of the two rival constructions contended for accords more readily with the sense and policy of the regulations as a whole. g

Regulation 5 provides:

'Subject to the following provisions of these Regulations, no vehicle shall be driven on any part of a motorway which is not a carriageway.'

I have already referred to reg 7 (1). Regulation 7 continues: h

'(2) Where it is necessary for a vehicle which is being driven on a carriageway to be stopped while it is on a motorway [and then there follow paragraphs (a) to (d) defining the four different types of emergency which may make a stop imperative for a motorist on a motorway] the vehicle shall, as soon and in so far as is reasonably practicable, be driven or moved off the carriageway on to, and may stop and remain at rest on, the verge which lies on the left-hand or near side of that vehicle while it is proceeding along that carriageway in accordance with the provisions of Regulation 6 [Regulation 6 being the regulation which governs the direction of driving]. j

a '(3) A vehicle which is at rest on a verge in any of the circumstances specified in paragraph (2) of this Regulation—(a) shall so far as is reasonably practicable be allowed to remain at rest on that verge in such a position only that no part of it or of the load carried thereby shall obstruct or be a cause of danger to vehicles using the carriageway ...'

Finally, reg 12 provides:

b 'No person shall at any time while on foot go or remain on any part of a motorway other than a verge except [in certain circumstances which are set out]'.
Counsel for the appellant submits that if 'marginal strip' is construed as referring to the white line on the nearside of the nearside lane of the motorway, then these provisions make sense and accord with every motorist's common understanding as to what parts of the motorway are intended for the passage of traffic, and what parts are intended for vehicles which have broken down or stopped in some other emergency. It accords with common sense, he says, and motorists' ordinary understanding that the hard shoulder is available for the broken down vehicle but is not available or intended for regular use by moving traffic. If, as he points out, the hard shoulder is part of the carriageway, then where there is no verge beyond the hard shoulder, there will be no part of the motorway where a vehicle which has broken down may legitimately remain, even for a short period. He draws our attention to the Highway Code³ which in terms states:

'If you have a breakdown get your vehicle off the carriageway on to the hard shoulder so that it does not get in the way of other traffic ...'

e Counsel for the respondent on the other hand boldly submits that the intention of the regulations is in effect that the hard shoulder should not be available for vehicles stopping in an emergency, but should function as what might be called a super slow lane. In my judgment as soon as one considers these rival arguments, it is plain that there can be only one answer, namely that the hard shoulder of a motorway is part of the verge and not part of the carriageway, and that 'marginal strip' in these regulations is, as counsel for the appellant submits, intended to refer not to the hard shoulder but to the white line which borders the running surface of the nearside lane.

f For those reasons I reach the conclusion that, technical as the point may be, this appellant was convicted of the wrong offence. I would allow the appeal and quash the conviction.

g BROWNE J. I felt great doubt and difficulty about this case, but I do not think I need burden the pages of the law reports with my mental processes, because in the end I have come to the conclusion that I agree with the judgment that has just been given by Bridge J, and accordingly I also agree with the result which he proposes.

h LORD WIDGERY CJ. I also agree with the judgment and with Bridge J's reasons. It may be that part of the trouble in this case is that the regulations⁴ were made in 1959 when motorways were still comparatively in their infancy, and some of the practice and layout has varied slightly since that time. However, the appeal will be allowed and the conviction quashed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, EDMUND DAVIES AND MEGAW LJJ

16th DECEMBER 1970

Contempt of court – Threatening witness – Threats after witness having given evidence at criminal trial – Trial still continuing – Threats so as to punish witness for what witness has said – Unnecessary to prove that other potential witnesses would get to know of threats.

C, a schoolgirl aged 14, gave evidence at the trial of a number of men charged with affray. After she had completed her evidence and been released by the judge she went to a café for a meal. There she was approached by the appellant who reproved her for giving evidence against his brother, one of the accused, and threatened her, clenching his fist and shouting at her. C was frightened and left the café. The appellant was brought before the judge and sentenced to three months' imprisonment for contempt. On appeal,

Held – The appeal would be dismissed; it was contempt of court to threaten a witness after he had given evidence so as to punish him for what he had said whether or not other potential witnesses got to know of the threats which had been made; accordingly the appellant was guilty of contempt (see p 59 c and h, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Colin Anthony Moore from the order of Park J dated 20th November 1970 and made at Bristol Assizes committing the appellant to prison for three months for contempt of court. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

M R Coombe for the appellant.

Gordon Slynn for the respondent.

LORD DENNING MR. On Thursday 19th November 1970 Park J at the Bristol Assizes was trying a number of men for an affray. A schoolgirl aged 14, Christine Margaret Chojnacki, gave evidence in the course of the morning in respect of one of the accused named Graham Moore. At the end of her evidence the judge released her. On the same day she went with another girl to a café nearby for a meal. She saw some men sitting at a table. One of the men was Colin Moore. He called Christine over to him and reproached her for giving evidence against his brother Graham. He said, 'That was tight of you—splitting on Graham'. Christine said, 'I never said it was definitely him, I said I think it was him'. Colin Moore said that his brother had never dragged anyone out. Another girl said to her, 'You'll be dragged along in a minute'. Colin Moore heard that remark and said to Christine 'You had better get a out of here fast'. At the same time he clenched his fist with his elbow on the table. He was shouting. He was a big man—big to her, anyway. She was frightened. She went out of the café and told the police.

The judge had Colin Moore brought before him. He asked counsel to represent him. He heard evidence on the next day in the absence of the jury. The judge accepted Christine's evidence. He held that Colin Moore had been guilty of a contempt of court. He sentenced him to three months' imprisonment. Colin Moore appeals b to this court.

The first question is whether this was a contempt. The law has been settled by *A-G v Butterworth*¹. The court will always preserve the freedom and integrity of witnesses and not allow them to be intimidated in any way, either before the trial, pending it or after it. Here it was after the girl had given evidence. It is a contempt c of court to assault a witness after he has given evidence: it is also a contempt of court to threaten him or put him in fear, if it is done so as to punish him for what he has said. There is no doubt whatever that this conduct of Colin Moore was a contempt.

The next question is, what is the appropriate sentence? This is more difficult. We have had before us Colin Moore's record. He is a man of 21. His record is not too good. In 1963, when he was much younger, for stealing, a probation order was d made against him. Two years ago for disorderly behaviour and using insulting words he was fined £30 and bound over. In October 1970 at the Portsmouth Magistrates' Court he was found guilty of stealing and fined £10 and 5 guineas costs. Now, within six weeks of that last conviction, he is threatening this schoolgirl of 14, frightening her in the middle of a case then being heard. I think the judge was amply justified in sentencing him then and there to three months' imprisonment. e I would dismiss the appeal.

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. I agree. I regard this as a quite substantial contempt of court, and I merely add the shortest postscript to the observations of Lord Denning MR. In *A-G v Butterworth*² Donovan LJ said:

f '... in this kind of case, it must be proved by the Crown that knowledge of the revenge taken on one who has given evidence is likely to come to the knowledge of potential witnesses in future cases.'

In the course of learned counsel's submission I ventured respectfully to doubt whether there was any incumbency on the Crown to prove any such thing. It thereafter emerged that in *Chapman v Honig*³ Lord Denning MR said:

g 'In my judgment the victimisation of a witness is a contempt of court and unlawful, irrespective of whether other people get to know of it or not. It is a gross affront to the dignity and authority of the court and a grievous wrong to the individual affected.'

I respectfully adopt those words, for I do not think there is any obligation on the h Crown to do more than prove that which has been abundantly established in the present case. As to the sentence, I concur with Lord Denning MR in all he has said.

MEGAW LJ. I agree.

j Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, CAIRNS AND ROSKILL LJJ

12th OCTOBER 1971 ^b

Compulsory purchase – Compensation – Purchase notice – Assumptions on valuation – Assumption that planning permission would be granted – Land comprised in development plan – Land in ‘area allocated primarily for a use specified in’ development plan – Residential use – Refusal of permission for building houses – Planning policy not to grant permission for development on land in question – Evidence that permission would never be granted – Permission not ‘reasonably to be expected’ – Grant of permission not to be assumed – Land Compensation Act 1961, s 16 (2). ^c

A large house with six acres of grounds was situated on a high ridge of land commanding a lovely countryside. The six acres were zoned for use for residential purposes in the county development plan, although the remaining land on the ridge was zoned to be kept open as part of the green belt. The claimants, who were the owners of the house and grounds, were granted planning permission for houses on part of the grounds but on four or five occasions were refused permission in respect of the remainder of the grounds. The reason for the refusal was to preserve the view of the ridge from the valley by ensuring that the skyline was studded with trees rather than houses. As was conceded, this planning policy made it clear that permission would never be granted for building houses on the remainder of the grounds. After the council had rejected an application to put up houses on a portion of the grounds which consisted of two-thirds of an acre on the top of the ridge the claimants served a notice under s 129 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, which was confirmed by the Minister, requiring the council to purchase it compulsorily. They claimed compensation amounting to £10,500 as the value of the land on the ground that, by virtue of s 16 (2)^a of the Land Compensation Act 1961, it was to be assumed that planning permission would be granted for its residential development. It was common ground that if the grant of planning permission could not be assumed the value of the land would be only £500. ^d

Held – Although para (a) of s 16 (2) of the 1961 Act was satisfied in that the land was in an area shown in the current development plan as allocated primarily for residential use and the development proposed was ‘development for the purposes of that use’, para (b) of s 16 (2) also had to be satisfied before it could be assumed that planning permission would be granted; on the admitted facts para (b) had not been satisfied because the proposed development was not ‘development for which planning permission might reasonably have been expected to be granted’; the evidence showed that planning permission would never be granted; accordingly the claimants were only entitled to £500 compensation (see p 62 e g and h, p 63 b and g and p 64 e and f, post). ^e c Caterham and Warlingham Urban District Council ("the council") appealed by way of case stated against a decision of the Lands Tribunal (Sir Michael Rowe QC President) given on 21st December 1970 determining at £10,500 the amount of compensation due to the claimants, Provincial Properties (London) Ltd, in respect of the acquisition by the council of their land on the east side of the Torwood Land, Whyteleafe, Caterham and Warlingham, Surrey, in pursuance of a purchase notice under s 129 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 confirmed by the Minister of Housing and Local Government by a letter dated 9th December 1966. The council claimed that d the proper compensation was £500. The facts are set out in the judgment.

G N Eyre QC and M H Spence for the council.

M L M Chavasse QC and A B Dawson for the claimants.

e LORD DENNING MR. At Whyteleafe in Surrey there is a high ridge of land which commands a lovely countryside. On it there used to be a large house called Bleak House, with grounds of some six acres. Surrey County Council made a development plan for the county. It was confirmed by the Minister in 1958. In that development plan Bleak House and its six acres of ground were zoned for residential purposes. The remaining ground on the ridge was zoned to be kept open and not built on. It was part of the green belt.

f The owners of Bleak House and its grounds were the claimants, Provincial Properties (London) Ltd. They applied for planning permission to build houses there. They got permission for a portion of the six acres, but not for the whole. They got planning permission for Bleak House to be converted into two dwellings and for eight detached houses to be built in a small part of the grounds. This permission was specially limited so as to keep houses on the west side of the ridge below the skyline. That permission was given for that part and the houses were built. g The owners made four or five other applications to build in the remainder of the grounds, but every one was refused. The reason for the refusal was to preserve the view of the ridge from the valley; so that the skyline should be studded with trees and not houses. This planning policy was so plain that it became clear that planning permission would never be granted for the remainder of the grounds.

h Now we come to the case in question. At the very top of the ridge here was a stretch of land of only two-thirds of an acre. It had been part of the grounds of Bleak House, and zoned accordingly for residential purposes. The owners applied for planning permission to put up three houses on that small two-thirds of an acre. On 11th May 1966 the council rejected it. Thereupon the owners served a notice requiring the local council to purchase the land compulsorily. The owners said it had been rendered sterile by refusal. It was a piece of rough grassland and had become incapable of any beneficial use in its existing state (s 129 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962). The local council said that it could be used for agricultural purposes. On appeal, the Minister thought the owners were right. j On 6th December 1966 he confirmed the purchase notice. Accordingly, the local council were deemed to have served a notice to treat on the owners in respect of the land, so as compulsorily to acquire it as at that date (s 133 of the 1962 Act).

So the question is: what is the compensation to be paid for this little piece of land? It is two-thirds of an acre at the top of the hill. It is zoned for residential purposes, but it is agreed on all hands that in no circumstances will planning permission ever be granted for it. It is also agreed that if planning permission could be expected for it, the value would be £10,500. (I assume that is three plots for three houses at £3,500 a plot.) But, if planning permission could not be expected for it, the value would only be £500. (I assume that is agricultural value, plus 'hope' value.) So the owners claim £10,500. The council say £500. (Incidentally, since all these happenings, this little piece of land has been removed from the residential zone. It is now designated as part of the metropolitan green belt. But that does not affect our present case, because at the material time it was still zoned as residential.)

This question depends on the true interpretation of the Land Compensation Act 1961. Section 16 (2) provides:

'If the relevant land or any part thereof (not being land subject to comprehensive development) consists or forms part of an area shown in the current development plan as an area allocated primarily for a use specified in the plan in relation to that area, it shall be assumed that planning permission would be granted, in respect of the relevant land or that part thereof, as the case may be, for any development which—(a) is development for the purposes of that use of the relevant land or that part thereof, and (b) is development for which planning permission might reasonably have been expected to be granted in respect of the relevant land or that part thereof, as the case may be.'

Applying that section here, the opening words are clearly satisfied. The current development plan was the Surrey Development Plan. The relevant land was this two-thirds of an acre. It was part of an area which was shown in the current development plan as allocated primarily for residential use. That was a use specified in the plan in relation to the area. Then the section goes on: 'it shall be assumed that planning permission would be granted ... for any development which—(a) is development for the purposes of that use ...', that is, in this case will be granted for any development which is residential; there the important conjunction is 'and'—'and (b) is development for which planning permission might reasonably have been expected to be granted ...'

It is quite plain that para (a) is satisfied for residential development, but that para (b) is not satisfied. On all the evidence planning permission could not reasonably be expected to be granted for this little two-thirds of an acre. It would be refused. So one of the assumptions does not exist. You cannot assume that planning permission would have been granted. No houses would be permitted on this piece of land.

What is the compensation payable, therefore, for land which is in an area zoned for residential use, but for which planning permission will not be given? This is often the position. Cases often arise where land is in an area zoned for residential use but permission is refused on some ground or other. It may be refused because of difficulties of access, or objections from the neighbours, or because houses on that particular piece would spoil the view; and so forth. The mere fact that land is within residential zoning does not in the least mean that planning permission could reasonably be expected in respect of it. If planning permission could not reasonably be expected, then compensation is to be assessed accordingly. The owner gets its value without planning permission, i.e. usually as agricultural land, not as building land.

Some reference was made to s 16 (6). That only means that if it is a case where you are to assume that planning permission will be granted, then you are further to assume that it will be granted subject to such conditions as might be expected to be imposed. That subsection does not apply at all to a case where, as in the present case, the owners could not expect planning permission at all. Test it this way. Suppose the owners of this land were to offer it for sale on the market? No purchaser

- a would give much for it. He would know that planning permission had been refused, and would be refused. The owner would not get any more than £500 for it. Now suppose that is the subject of compulsory purchase. Is the owner to get £10,500 on the footing that planning permission would be given for these houses? Clearly not. He is only to get the £500 which it is worth without planning permission. I would, therefore, allow the appeal and say the proper compensation is £500, and not £10,500.

- CAIRNS LJ. I agree that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons given by Lord Denning MR. I agree with the construction which he has placed on s 16 (2) of the Land Compensation Act 1961. I am bound to say that but for the view tentatively expressed by Russell LJ in *Devotwill Investments Ltd v Margate Corpn*¹, and for the conclusion arrived at by the President of the Lands Tribunal in this case (to which I pay great respect because his knowledge of this Act is infinitely greater than mine), I should have thought the meaning of this section was quite plainly that which Lord Denning MR has indicated. The subsection provides that it is to be assumed that planning permission would be granted in respect of the land for any development which fulfils two conditions. The two conditions are stated—(a) and (b); and unless it can be shown that the development fulfils those two conditions, it seems to me on the plain meaning of the subsection that the assumption cannot be made. The contrary view was indicated in the report to which I have been referred by Russell LJ in these terms. He said²:

- e ‘(It is not material in the present case, but I am inclined to disagree with the view expressed by the Lands Tribunal on the construction of the section that it is possible to find that no such development might reasonably have been expected to have been permitted: I would prefer the view that the function of s 16 (2) (b) is to restrict the carte blanche of the rest of the subsection but never to extinguish its operation).’

- f That was the view with which Sir Michael Rowe QC, President of the Lands Tribunal, agreed, and it has been put before this court by counsel for the claimants. But it does not seem to me that the right approach to this subsection is to look at the effect of para (a) standing by itself and then to ask whether its effect can be restricted or extinguished under para (b). The two paragraphs have to be applied together, and unless they are both fulfilled, then the assumption which is called for by the body of the subsection cannot be made. For those reasons I agree that the construction placed on this subsection by the Lands Tribunal was wrong.

- g An alternative argument was advanced by counsel for the claimants on which Sir Michael Rowe QC did not give any decision. It was not necessary for him to do so having regard to the conclusion that he formed on the other part of the case. This is an argument based on s 133 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, and on certain sections of Part V of that Act to which reference is made in s 133. I can only say that for my part I cannot see how the section has anything whatever to do with the assessment of this compensation, and therefore I am not able to see how that argument of counsel could assist the case of the claimants here. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

- j ROSKILL LJ. I also agree that the appeal should be allowed. I only add a few words out of respect to the President of the Lands Tribunal, Sir Michael Rowe QC, from whom we are differing and, who, as Lord Denning MR has said, has great experience in this field. The learned President said: ‘In the present case there was never a hope of permission’. The argument before him proceeded on the admission on the part of the claimants that they could not get and could not expect thereafter to get planning permission for any number of houses on this small area of land. The learned president said (rightly in my view) that the argument before him centred on the true construction of s 16 (2) (b) of the Land Compensation Act 1961. He stated the rival arguments thus—I quote from his decision:

‘Does that [i.e. para (b)] mean that although you must assume under [para] (a) that planning permission would be granted for the purposes of the use shown for the land in the development plan, namely primarily for residential use, you must nonetheless look to see whether at the date of the notice to treat there was any reasonable expectation that planning permission would have been granted for any residential development and that if there was not, you must disregard the paragraph (a) assumption? Or as the claimants contended, does it mean only that having made the assumption under (a), you must then consider the sort of residential development for which planning permission might reasonably be expected, i.e. what density, what means of access and so on?’

The learned President accepted the argument of counsel for the claimants in favour of the latter view. This argument has been repeated in this court and came to this, that the view for which authority contended involved construing para (b) as cutting down and indeed emasculating para (a). For my part, I do not think that is the right approach; nor do I think that the true construction has that effect. Before the compensation can be assessed under s 16 (1) (b) there are two conditions which must be fulfilled. First, the development has to be development for the purpose of the relevant use—that is residential use of the relevant land. No one has disputed that. Secondly, it has to be development for which planning permission might reasonably have been expected to be granted in respect of the relevant land. On the finding and indeed the concession that there was no hope of permission being granted, it seems to me, with great respect to the argument of counsel for the claimants, that on the true construction of s 16 (2) (b) the answer is clear. As to what Russell LJ said in *Devotwill Investments Ltd v Margate Corp*³, it is perhaps necessary to say that we were told that this point did not directly arise either in this court or subsequently in the House of Lords⁴, and the learned lord justice did not have the benefit of hearing any argument on it, such as we have had.

So far as the alternative argument of counsel for the claimants under s 133 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 is concerned, I am unable to see how that affects the assessment of compensation under s 16 (2). If therefore the claimants’ claim fails, as it does in my judgment, on the true construction of that section, I do not think they can pray in aid s 133 as producing any different result. For those reasons I think the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

D was charged with corruptly offering £500 to S as a reward for promoting the interests of JLC Ltd and S was also charged with agreeing to receive that sum. In relation to those two counts it was established that, in April 1965, S had met D, and a representative of JLC Ltd from whom D stood to receive a commission in the event of JLC Ltd being awarded a contract by the council, and there was evidence that thereafter S furthered JLC Ltd's interests at council meetings until, in April 1966, a letter of intent was sent by the council to JLC Ltd with the object of employing them. In September 1966 JLC Ltd signed a contract of employment with S under which the payment of £500 was made to S. The jury found as a fact that D knew about this arrangement and was a party to it. Although the contract between the council and JLC Ltd was not concluded until March 1967 the prosecution case was not presented on the basis that S was being remunerated in September 1966 for any assistance thereafter. The judge referred to the respective counts against S and D as 'mirror counts' thereby indicating to the jury that they should stand or fall together. S and D were both convicted on those counts.

A Ltd, S and D appealed against conviction on the relevant counts. On behalf of S and D it was contended, inter alia, that s 1 of the 1889 Act had no application where the reward was made for a past favour and further, on behalf of D, that the judge was wrong in indicating to the jury that the counts against S and D stood or fell together.

Held – (i) The appeal of A Ltd would be allowed. It was not every 'responsible agent' or 'high executive' or 'agent acting on behalf of a company' who could by his actions make the company criminally responsible; it was necessary to establish whether, on the facts, the natural person in question had the status and authority which, in law, would make his acts the acts of the company itself; accordingly it was necessary for the judge to invite the jury to consider whether or not there were established those facts which the judge had decided as a matter of law were necessary to identify the person concerned with the company; since that had not been done in the present case the conviction of A Ltd should be quashed (see p 70 b, c and e, post).

Dicta of Lord Reid in Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass [1971] 2 All ER at 131, 134 applied.

(ii) The appeals of S and D would be dismissed for the following reasons—

(a) although X had been acquitted on the charge of corruptly offering emoluments to S it did not follow that S's conviction for corruptly accepting those emoluments was unsafe, since it was inevitable that, so long as it was possible for persons concerned in a single offence to be tried separately, the verdicts returned by the different juries would on occasion appear to be inconsistent with one another; this could be accounted for by differences in the evidence presented to the respective juries, or the different views which the juries had separately taken of the witnesses, and reflected the fact that the verdict 'not guilty' included 'not proven'; inconsistency alone did not, therefore, render a verdict of 'guilty' unsafe, and, since in the present case there was no suggestion that evidence favourable to S had been given in the trial of X which was not given in the trial of S, there were no grounds for concluding that the verdict against S was unsatisfactory (see p 71 h and j to p 72 c, post);

(b) it was not necessary under s 1 of the 1889 Act to establish a corrupt agreement for reward in contemplation of future favours; in the context of s 1 it would be unnatural not to give a post facto meaning to the word 'reward' and accordingly it was open to the jury to convict S and D on the basis that the agreement for the payment to S made in September 1966 related solely to favours performed by S in furthering JLC Ltd's interests prior to April 1966 (see p 73 d and e, post);

(c) although two counts in an indictment might be so closely connected that an acquittal on one and a conviction on the other might, on the face of it, appear to be inconsistent, it was undesirable for the judge to indicate that the two counts should stand or fall together, for strict regard for the rules of evidence might lead to different verdicts and, in cases of corruption, it was possible to envisage a bribe being corruptly offered and innocently received or vice versa; however on the facts it was impossible

- a to conceive that the payment was corruptly received by S unless corruptly given by D; furthermore, although it was clear that S's conduct on the council in relation to the other accused was an important factor in the deliberations of the jury, the evidence thereof was admissible in the case against D; evidence of S's activities was admissible as evidence of system in relation to the issue whether S was acting with a corrupt motive; the fact that the conduct was that of S and not of D did not detract from the relevance of the evidence (see p 73 j to p 74 d and e, post); dictum of A T Lawrence J in R v Bond [1904-07] All ER Rep at 41 applied.

Appeals

- On 23rd March 1971 at the Central Criminal Court before Judge Edward Clarke QC and a jury the appellants, Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd, heating and ventilating engineers, Sidney Frederick Charles Sporle, and Peter George Day, were charged with bribery and corruption under s 1 of the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889, in relation to building contracts of the Battersea Metropolitan Borough Council and the London Borough of Wandsworth Council when the appellant Sporle was a member and chairman of the housing committee or member of the council. The appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd were found guilty on one count of offering the appellant Sporle emoluments in connection with their employment on council housing projects and were fined £10,000; the appellant Sporle was found guilty on seven counts of corruption and sentenced to six years' imprisonment; the appellant Day was found guilty on the only count on which he was charged, that of corruptly offering £500 to the appellant Sporle for the appellant Sporle's wife as an inducement for promoting the interests of a company of building contractors, and he was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment. The appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd were given leave to appeal against conviction on two grounds and applied for leave to appeal on other grounds after refusal; the appellant Sporle applied for leave to appeal against conviction on five counts; and the appellant Day applied for leave to appeal against conviction: in each case from refusal by a single judge. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

11th October. EVELEIGH J read the judgment of the court so far as it concerned appeals or applications for leave to appeal against conviction at the invitation of Lord Widgery CJ. On 23rd March 1971 at the Central Criminal Court in a trial which lasted over six weeks the appellants, Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd, Sidney Frederick Charles Sporle and Peter George Day, were charged with bribery and corruption under s 1 of the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889, in relation to council building contracts of the Battersea Metropolitan Borough Council and the London Borough of Wandsworth Council when the appellant Sporle was member and chairman of the housing committee or member of the council.

Count 1 charged that the appellant Sporle on 4th January 1965 corruptly agreed to receive a salary from Ellis (Kensington) Ltd as an inducement to or reward for favouring them. Count 2 alleged a similar agreement in respect of salary from Property Estates Development Ltd again for favouring Ellis (Kensington) Ltd. Count 3 alleged a similar agreement on 27th January 1967 to receive a motor car from Property Estates Development Ltd for favouring Ellis (Kensington) Ltd. Count 4 alleged that the appellant Sporle corruptly solicited from one Culpin employment for Ellis (Kensington) Ltd on account of the appellant Sporle favouring or forbearing to disfavour Mr Culpin. Count 5 charged the appellant Sporle with agreeing on 2nd September 1966 to receive £500 for his wife from the appellant Day 'as an inducement to or reward for . . . promoting the interests of John Laing Construction Limited'. Count 6 charged the appellant Day with corruptly offering the £500. Count 7 alleged that between 31st October 1966 and 29th April 1967 the appellant Sporle corruptly agreed to receive emoluments from employment by the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd for favouring them. On count 8 the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd were charged with corruptly offering the appellant Sporle the emoluments. Count 9 alleged that the appellant Sporle on 28th April 1967 corruptly solicited from one Harding employment for the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd on a housing scheme of the borough council on account of the appellant Sporle favouring or forbearing to disfavour Mr Harding's firm. In this count the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd and their employee Green were charged with aiding and abetting the appellant Sporle. Count 10 alleged that the appellant Sporle between 1st November 1965 and 6th July 1967 agreed to receive emoluments from one T D Smith for favouring Fleet Press Services Ltd.

The appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd were found guilty on count 8 but they and Mr Green were acquitted on count 9. The appellant Sporle was found guilty on all counts except count 3. The appellant Day was found guilty on count 6. Mr T D Smith was granted a separate trial in respect of offering the emoluments referred to in count 10. One J C Bianco was granted a separate trial in respect of a charge alleging that he corruptly solicited advantages for the appellant Sporle from Mr Culpin in return for the appellant Sporle favouring Mr Culpin. Both Mr Smith and Mr Bianco were subsequently acquitted by the jury.

The appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd were given leave to appeal against conviction on two grounds, in their notice of appeal, and seek leave to appeal after refusals on other grounds. The appellant Sporle seeks leave to appeal against conviction in respect of counts 1, 5, 7, 9 and 10 and the appellant Day seeks leave to appeal against his conviction, in each case after refusal by the single judge.

The Crown's case was that the appellant Sporle used his position on the council to obtain sums of money in return for support in obtaining building contracts from the council. The evidence showed, it was said, a systematic course of conduct to show favour where he had financial expectations and that when he acted in purported discharge of his duties to the council he failed to disclose his interest. In this way it was sought to show that he acted intending to benefit his employers or their nominees without regard to the interest of the council. Once his support for candidates for contracts from the council was shown to be given with improper intentions or motives

- a (it being too much of a coincidence that so often those he supported turned out to be his employers) there was material relevant to the question of the existence of an antecedent agreement to do so in return for benefits to himself which the evidence showed he received. In this connection the fervour of his support for the cause of his employers was also relied on. Thus it was said he was so determined to assist Ellis (Kensington) Ltd that he even threatened Mr Culpin—an independent architect
- b appointed to carry out some of the council's plans—with the possible loss of council work unless Ellis (Kensington) Ltd were given sub-contracts. So too, in relation to the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd, he made a similar threat to Mr Harding. Both of these gentlemen refused to be coerced.

The appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd

- c The grounds on which the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd were given leave to appeal were: failure properly to direct on law as to the criminal responsibility of a limited liability company for the act of a servant and failure to deal with the correct factors that in law determine the question whether a criminal intention in an employee is also that of the company. On examination these two grounds overlap, for in the present case the offence was not an absolute statutory offence but involved criminal conduct and a guilty mind on the part, it was said, of the company's senior
- d employees. The question, therefore, of the status and authority of the person or persons responsible was of great importance.

- The Crown concedes, and in the view of this court rightly concedes, that the learned judge's direction was not adequate. There were three people who were alleged by the Crown to have the status and authority to involve the company itself in criminal liability for corruption in connection with the offer of employment to the
- e appellant Sporle as a reward for anticipated favours from him. Those three were Mr Neuman, the managing director, Mr Allen, a 'technical director' and Mr Williams, the manager of the or a housing division. That these three were concerned in the engagement of the appellant Sporle there is no doubt. The actual offer of employment was made by Mr Neuman in a letter which Mr Allen had some part in drafting. Whether or not it was one, two or all of these three who sought or were party to
- f seeking favours for the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd from the appellant Sporle as a return for the offer of employment was, as is usually the case, a matter of inference from the evidence. The learned judge directed the jury as follows:

- 'If an act is done by anyone who is in control of a company and who is in authority to perform an important act of that sort then that act of that person can be the act of the company itself . . . if an act is done by a responsible agent or a
- g company; if in the course of that act that agent commits an offence and he does it in the name of the company then the company is liable . . . if an agent acts corruptly on behalf of the company the corruption of the agent is the corruption of the company. That is not an absolute rule; it is a principle which depends on the circumstances of the offence . . . if one of these people, Williams or Allen or Neuman or any combination of them acting as a high executive of Andrews Weatherfoil indulges in the employment of a person to act corruptly to further the interests of the company of which that man is one of the executive directors the company is responsible and the company is guilty of a criminal offence.'
- h

On counsel drawing the judge's attention to the fact that Mr Williams was not a director he continued:

- i 'There is no magic in being a director. If you are the manager of the housing department or in any high executive position in such a way that you can recommend to your managing director that someone should be employed, as it is said Allen (sic) recommended Sporle, in those circumstances the person who recommends it, who is in a high position, if you are satisfied that he did that in the name of the company and it was corrupt the company can be liable. That is a matter for you as to whether or not you are satisfied that that employment by Sporle was done with the approval and knowledge of a high executive of Andrews Weatherfoil acting as an agent of the company for the purpose of his employment and that employment to the knowledge of the executive or executives was corrupt.' a

It is not every 'responsible agent' or 'high executive' or 'manager of the housing department' or 'agent acting on behalf of a company' who can by his actions make the company criminally responsible. It is necessary to establish whether the natural person or persons in question have the status and authority which in law make their acts in the matter under consideration the acts of the company so that the natural person is to be treated as the company itself. It is often a difficult question to decide whether or not the person concerned is in a sufficiently responsible position to involve the company in liability for the acts in question according to the law as laid down by the authorities. As Lord Reid said in *Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass*¹: b

'It must be a question of law whether, once the facts have been ascertained, a person in doing particular things is to be regarded as the company or merely as the company's servant or agent. In that case any liability of the company can only be a statutory or vicarious liability.' c

'I think that the true view is that the judge must direct the jury that if they find certain facts proved then as a matter of law they must find that the criminal act of the officer, servant or agent including his state of mind, intention, knowledge or belief is the act of the company.' e

It follows that it is necessary for the judge to invite the jury to consider whether or not there are established those facts which the judge decides as a matter of law are necessary to identify the person concerned with the company. This was not done in the present case.

The court was invited to apply the proviso to s 2 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968. It is not possible, however, to decide whether or not the jury regarded Mr Neuman, Mr Allen or Mr Williams, or any or what combination of them as responsible for the criminal act. Mr Williams's position in the company is not at all clear and the description 'housing manager' does not succeed in making it so. To a less extent this is true of Mr Allen. Consequently it is impossible to say that the jury would have arrived at the same verdict if properly directed and it follows that this appeal must succeed. f

Insofar as the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd seek leave to appeal on other grounds it will be sufficient to say that leave is not granted. g

The appellant Sporle

Count 1. The appellant Sporle contended that the judge failed clearly to direct the jury that corruption had to be proved at the time of the appellant entering the employment of Ellis (Kensington) Ltd and that proof of a later supervening corruption was not enough. The Crown had presented the case on that basis. The date alleged in the particulars, namely, 4th January 1965, was not vital in this kind of charge but coupled with the way in which the case had been presented it meant, as counsel for the Crown properly conceded, that the beginning of the appellant Sporle's employment was the material period. Whilst it is true that the judge said 'Whether it was the 4th January or thereabouts matters not' he went on to say that the allegation in count 1 was that the appellant Sporle was employed on that date substantially h

- a for the purpose of putting forward Ellis's interests and that he was paid over £1,000 a year from 1st January so that—'if you are satisfied so that you are sure that he agreed to receive that money in return for those favours you ought to find him guilty. If you are not satisfied you find him not guilty.'
- b It was also contended that the judge failed to remind the jury that there was no evidence of corruption until after the appellant Sporle had become employed by the company. The judge did in fact remind the jury that the appellant Sporle had been employed by a Mr Nixon, the sales manager (Mr Ellis did not give evidence), and that according to Mr Nixon there had been some preliminary discussion as to approaching the council, but it was made clear to the appellant Sporle that he was debarred from doing so. The judge further told the jury that the nub of the allegation
- c against the appellant Sporle was his threat to Mr Culpin in March 1965, that is after he began to work for Mr Ellis. The appellant Sporle's contentions are unfounded. The judge summed up the facts fairly to the jury and there was clear evidence from which the jury were entitled to infer a corrupt agreement at the beginning of the appellant Sporle's employment.
- d Count 5. This count can conveniently be dealt with at the same time as count 6 on which the appellant Day applies for leave.
Count 7. It is claimed that if the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd succeed on the two grounds stated in their notice of appeal, the appellant Sporle's conviction is unsatisfactory.
- e In returning a verdict of guilty against the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd, the jury must have concluded that a corrupt offer of employment with the company had been made to the appellant Sporle and accepted by him. This court had only decided that the jury were not properly directed whether or not the person making the offer was in such a position as to involve the company in criminal liability. This decision in no way affects the question whether or not the appellant Sporle corruptly agreed to accept employment.
- f Count 9. It is claimed that if the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd succeed as above, the conviction of the appellant Sporle on count 9 is unsatisfactory. This argument is very difficult to follow for count 9 alleges that the appellant Sporle personally made a corrupt request himself to Mr Harding. The point of law in the appeal of the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd on count 8 has no relevance to the question whether or not the appellant Sporle made such a request.
- g Count 10. It is said that as Mr Smith was acquitted on 12th July 1971 on the charge of corruptly offering emoluments to the appellant Sporle, the appellant Sporle's conviction for corruptly accepting those emoluments is unsafe.
- h As long as it is possible for persons concerned in a single offence to be tried separately, it is inevitable that the verdicts returned by the two juries will on occasion appear to be inconsistent with one another. Such a result may be due to differences in the evidence presented at the two trials or simply to the different views which the juries separately take of the witnesses. That the result produced by such inconsistency is 'unsatisfactory' cannot be disputed but it is the unsatisfactory character of the guilty verdict to which s 13 of the Criminal Justice Act 1968 is directed, rather than an unsatisfactory result of the two trials as a whole. When inconsistent verdicts are returned by the same jury, the position is usually more simple. If the inconsistency shows that that single jury was confused, or self-contradictory, its conclusions
- i are unsatisfactory or unsafe and neither verdict is reliable. Very often, however, an apparent inconsistency reflects no more than the jury's strict adherence to the judge's direction that they must consider each case separately and that evidence against one may not be admissible against the other; e.g. where there is a signed confession. So, too, where the verdicts are returned by different juries the inconsistency does not, of itself, indicate that the jury which returned the verdict was confused or misled or reached an incorrect conclusion on the evidence before it. The verdict 'not guilty' includes 'not proven'. We do not, therefore, accept the submission of counsel for the appellant Sporle that inconsistent verdicts from different juries ipso facto renders the guilty verdict unsafe. If, as will usually be the case, the evidence at the two trials was significantly different this not only explains the different verdicts but also defeats the claim that inconsistency alone renders the guilty verdict unsafe. If the difference in the evidence consists of additional material favourable to the accused being called at the second trial, the first accused should seek to call that evidence in this court and not rely merely on the inconsistent verdicts. The jury in the present case had the opportunity of hearing the appellant Sporle in the witness box, and there has been no suggestion that evidence favourable to the appellant Sporle was given in Mr Smith's trial which was not given in the trial of the appellant Sporle. There are, therefore, no grounds for concluding that the verdict against the appellant Sporle was unsatisfactory.

The appellants Sporle and Day

Counts 5 and 6. In April 1965 in the Grosvenor Hotel the appellant Sporle met the appellant Day and one Cameron, employed by John Laing Construction Ltd, from whom the appellant Day stood to receive commission in the event of Laing's being awarded a contract by the council. There was evidence that subsequent to this meeting the appellant Sporle furthered the interest of Laing's until April 1966 when a letter of intent was sent by the council to Laing's with the object of employing them. On 1st September 1966 Mr Brennan, managing director of the company, signed a contract of employment between the company and the appellant Sporle. The appellant Day was out of the country. On 2nd September it was arranged between the appellant Sporle and Mr Brennan that the sum of £500, being the appellant Sporle's fee under the contract, should be paid to the appellant Sporle's wife. Although the letter of intent was not the final contract, and there were further necessary negotiations before the contract was concluded in March 1967, the case was not presented on the basis that the appellant Sporle was being remunerated in September 1966 for any assistance thereafter.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants Sporle and Day that it was necessary in a charge under s 1 of the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889 to establish a corrupt agreement for reward in contemplation of future favours, and that a reward post facto unrelated to any such earlier agreement was not enough. It was contended that the judge did not make this clear to the jury. Section 1 (1) of the 1889 Act provides:

'Every person who shall by himself or by or in conjunction with any other person, corruptly solicit or receive, or agree to receive, for himself, or for any other person, any gift, loan, fee, reward, or advantage whatever as an inducement to, or reward for, or otherwise on account of any member, officer, or servant of a public body as in this Act defined, doing or forbearing to do anything in respect of any matter or transaction whatsoever, actual or proposed, in which the said public body is concerned, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.'

There is no doubt that the word 'reward' can be given the natural meaning of a post facto gift without any antecedent agreement.

It was argued, however, that the word 'doing' was the present participle and that to bring within the section a reward made without an agreement which preceded the favour was to construe the verb as though it read 'having done'. A similar argument was directed to the use of the present tense in the phrase 'in which the said public body is concerned'. The court's attention was drawn to the wording of s 1 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906, in which the past tense is specifically used in the phrase 'for having after the passing of this Act done or forborne to do any act', a etc. However, the specific use of the past participle in that Act was by way of contrast to preceding present participles in order to express Parliament's intention that a reward for a past act without antecedent agreement would only be an offence in respect of an act done after the passing of the Act. It was also pointed out that s 99 (2) (b) of the Representation of the People Act 1949 uses the words 'corruptly does any such act as aforesaid on account of any voter having voted or refrained from voting'. Again this court does not find the reference to the wording of another statute helpful in construing the relevant section in the present case. Section 99 of the Representation of the People Act 1949 sets out in separate clauses the different acts which were made to constitute bribery. A distinction appears in the clause to which counsel referred in that the word 'corruptly' is introduced which does not appear in the other clauses setting out other acts which are made to constitute bribery.

c The court does not say that another statute in pari materia may not be looked at as an aid to construction in an appropriate case but when, as in the present case, the court is satisfied as to the meaning on the natural wording of the section it is neither necessary nor desirable to refer to other statutes enacted for different purposes.

d This court is of the opinion that it would be unnatural not to give a post facto meaning to the word 'reward'. It is to be noted that that word is not only used in association with the words 'gift', 'loan', 'fee' and 'advantage' but is repeated in contradistinction to 'inducement' in the phrase 'as an inducement to, or reward for'. The use of the present tense in the phrase commencing with the words 'doing or forbearing to do' is equally applicable to past or future conduct seeing that that phrase is simply descriptive of the nature of the activity for the time being contemplated as the subject-matter of the inducement or reward. This court then is of the opinion that the Act covers receipt of money for a past favour without any antecedent agreement and it was open to the jury to convict both accused on this basis.

e However, the judge in fact left the case to the jury on a more favourable basis, for taken as a whole his direction indicated that they should look for an agreement before April 1966. He specifically said:

f '... of course, if the £500 and any suggestion of any money was not given until after everything was over, and there was no suggestion that he was to have an inducement or reward beforehand that would not be good enough.'

There was in fact ample evidence from which an antecedent agreement could be inferred and consequently this ground for leave to appeal fails.

g Counsel for the appellant Day made a number of points on various passages in the summing-up, and contended that the jury had not been reminded of parts of the evidence favourable to his client. The court has carefully considered those submissions, but it has no doubt that the case for the appellant Day was adequately and fairly put.

h It was also said that the judge wrongly directed the jury to the effect that the appellant Day would be responsible for the contract signed by Mr Brennan when the appellant Day was out of the country. In the view of this court the judge made it perfectly clear that it was necessary for the jury to be satisfied that the appellant Day, as the judge himself said, 'knew that this was going to be done and was a party to it.'

i It was further argued that the judge had wrongly referred to counts 5 and 6 as 'mirror counts' indicating to the jury that they should stand or fall together. It was said that on the facts of the present case this resulted in the jury taking into account the appellant Sporle's activities in relation to the other transactions such as those concerning Ellis and the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd.

Two counts in an indictment may be so closely connected that an acquittal or conviction on one would appear logically to a layman to lead to an acquittal or conviction on another. The strict regard for the rules of evidence and the burden of proof, however, may lead to different verdicts, as those practising in the courts are well aware. It is consequently undesirable, however closely connected the facts of the two counts may be, for the judge to adopt the expression 'mirror counts'. In cases of corruption it is possible to envisage a bribe being corruptly offered and innocently accepted and possible even the other way round. On the facts of the present case, however, it is impossible to conceive that the £500 was corruptly received by the appellant Sporle unless corruptly given by the appellant Day. The court recognises that the appellant Sporle's conduct on the council in relation to the other accused would be an important factor in the deliberations of the jury, but it is of the opinion that the evidence relating thereto was admissible in the case against the appellant Day.

In the forefront of the case was the allegation that the appellant Sporle was actively engaged in supporting Laing's quarrels with the council. This the appellant Sporle was entitled to do if he was acting with the council's interests in mind, but was not entitled to do if he acted with a corrupt motive. The state of the appellant Sporle's mind was consequently relevant. Evidence of system is admissible for this purpose to show the appellant Sporle's intention and whether his support in the council was proper and innocent on the one hand, or improper and corrupt on the other. In *R v Bond*³ A T Lawrence J said:

'Where, however, acts are of such a character that, taken alone, they may be innocent, but which result in benefit or reward to the actor and loss or suffering to the patient, repeated instances of such acts at least shew that experience has fully informed the actor of all their elements and details, and it is only reasonable to infer that the act is designed and intentional, and its motive the benefit or reward to himself or the loss or suffering to some third person.'

One might appropriately add 'or to benefit or reward those from whom he had expectations'. The fact that the conduct was that of the appellant Sporle and not of the appellant Day does not detract from the relevance of the evidence.

The result is that the appeal of the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd will be allowed on the two grounds in their notice of appeal and their conviction will be quashed. In relation to the other grounds and to the applications of the appellants Sporle and Day leave to appeal is given and the appeals dismissed.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. I now pass to sentence. It is not necessary to deal with the considerations at very great length because they are really all apparent from the judgment which has already been delivered, save only to add that which has been so admirably added by counsel for the appellant Sporle, the very large credit side of the account which the appellant Sporle can claim in view of his long and distinguished record with these local authorities. This is an example of a case, which happily does not arise often, where a man of perfect character who has done a great deal of exceptionally good work for the community commits a serious breach of his trust and eventually stands his trial and is convicted for it. The courts have always, we think rightly, taken the view that such cases must be marked with a substantial sentence of imprisonment. There are many others in the books of recent years of which that can be said.

It is, however, considered that when due regard is had to what I have called the credit side of the account, that a total of six years is excessive and is greater than is merited by the circumstances of this case. We find it unnecessary to say more than that. We accede to that argument; we think it is possible now, having reviewed both sides of the matter, to reduce the sentence on the appellant Sporle to some degree, and in regard to the application for leave to appeal against sentence we shall grant leave to appeal with the consent, which I am sure will be forthcoming, from counsel for the appellant Sporle; we shall treat the application as the hearing of the appeal and in respect of each sentence of 18 months we shall substitute a sentence of 12 a months. This will result in a total period of imprisonment of 4 years as against the period of 6 years' imprisonment imposed by the learned trial judge.

So far as the appellant Day is concerned, it is we think obvious that he should be regarded on the same basis as the appellant Sporle in regard to the one incident with which he was concerned, and we shall make a corresponding reduction in his case. Accordingly, we shall grant him leave to appeal against sentence; with counsel
b for the appellant Day's concurrence we shall treat the application as the hearing of the appeal, and for the sentence of 18 months' imprisonment we shall substitute a sentence of 12 months' imprisonment.

Appeal of the appellants Andrews Weatherfoil Ltd against conviction allowed. Applications of the appellants Sporle and Day to appeal against conviction granted but appeals dismissed. Appeals of the appellants Sporle and Day against sentence allowed in part. Sentences varied.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

PHILLIMORE LJ, PARK AND GRIFFITHS JJ

The appellant was a drug addict. In November 1969 he was prescribed 70 amphetamine tablets by his doctor. He put the tablets in a pocket of his jeans which he placed in a drawer in his bedroom. A few days later he discovered that his mother had taken his jeans and washed them. He thereupon came to the genuine conclusion that, in washing the jeans, his mother had destroyed the remaining tablets which he had not yet taken. He told the doctor what had happened and obtained a prescription for a further supply to make good the loss. In September 1970, months after the treatment had been completed, the appellant discovered that the missing tablets were still in his bedroom drawer. Thereafter the police made a search and found the tablets. In consequence he was charged with unlawful possession of the tablets contrary to s 1 (1)^a of the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964. It was argued, inter alia, by the Crown that the tablets were only prescribed for a particular course of treatment and that the appellant had no business to be in possession of them once the g treatment had been concluded; further that, since possession involved at least two elements, i.e. actual custody and the mental element of knowledge, the appellant's mistaken belief that they had been destroyed meant that he thereupon ceased to be in possession and, consequently, the rediscovery constituted a new possession which was not by virtue of any prescription and which was, therefore, unlawful. The court accepted the Crown's argument and the appellant was convicted. On appeal, a Section 1 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 77 d, post

Held – The appeal would be allowed for the following reasons—

(i) where a person was in lawful possession of drugs under a doctor's prescription, the possession of those drugs which remained unconsumed did not automatically become unlawful once the treatment was concluded (see p 78 c, post);

(ii) where a person who was in lawful possession of drugs forgot their existence, or mistakenly thought that they had been disposed of or destroyed, although in fact they remained in his custody, he did not thereby cease to be in possession of them; it followed that the continued possession remained lawful; accordingly the tablets were in the appellant's possession by virtue of the doctor's prescription (see p 78 e f and h, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Peter William Buswell against his conviction at Reading Borough Quarter Sessions on 21st January 1971 on a charge of unlawful possession of drugs contrary to s 1 (1) of the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

I D G Alexander for the appellant.

H Wilson for the Crown.

PHILLIMORE LJ delivered the judgment of the court. This is an appeal against conviction by the certificate of the deputy recorder. The appellant appeared at Reading Borough Quarter Sessions on 21st January 1971 and, after he had given his evidence, he was found guilty by the direction of the deputy recorder of unlawful possession of drugs contrary to s 1 (1) of the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964. He was conditionally discharged for two years.

The learned deputy recorder gave a certificate stating that the case—

‘raises the question of law whether, on the facts, admitted by the [appellant], his possession of the drugs was lawful or unlawful.’

It is that point we have to determine.

The facts were these. The appellant was a drug addict. It appears that he was for a time under treatment in the Royal Berkshire Clinic, but then, in August 1969, his treatment was transferred from the clinic to his own doctor, a Dr Taylor. From August onwards Dr Taylor was prescribing certain weekly doses of amphetamine for the appellant on a gradually decreasing scale. Indeed the treatment finally concluded in January 1970.

Now, in the course of that treatment, on 11th November 1969, Dr Taylor prescribed 70 amphetamine tablets. We have not seen the actual prescription, but the doctor explained that he anticipated that the appellant, being an addict, would take them all in the course of the week following. It appears that the appellant either put them, or thought that he had put them, in the pocket of his jeans which in turn a he put in a drawer in his bedroom. Of course he took a few in the immediately succeeding days. Then on 15th November he discovered to his horror that his mother had been through his drawer and washed his jeans. He came to the conclusion—and there does not seem to be any doubt that this was a genuine conclusion—that in washing his jeans, she had dissolved the balance of his supply, namely about 40 tablets. So he went back to Dr Taylor and explained what had happened or what he believed to have happened and asked for a prescription to make good his loss. The doctor b having checked the facts with the boy's father, who assured him that the story was true, prescribed a new lot of 40 tablets to supplement the loss. So matters went on.

In September 1970, months after the treatment had been completed, the appellant, apparently at his mother's behest, started to clear out his drawer altogether, and in the course of so doing he found his missing tablets. He could not resist the temptation of taking some of them, and then the police had cause to make a search and they c found that he had 18 still in his possession that he had not consumed. Hence this prosecution for being in unlawful possession of those tablets.

Of course this was an offence laid under the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964, s 1 (1), which provides, after dealing with possible regulations:

d '... it shall not be lawful for a person to have in his possession a substance for the time being specified in the Schedule to this Act [needless to say amphetamines are specified in the Schedule] unless—(a) it is in his possession by virtue of the issue of a prescription by a duly qualified medical practitioner or a registered dental practitioner for its administration by way of treatment to him, or to a person under his care . . .'

What is said by the Crown here and accepted by the deputy recorder, who directed e the jury to convict, is this: it may be that when he got his original 70 under the prescription, he was lawfully in possession; but of course, they were designed for his treatment and in fact these tablets which were found in his possession in September 1970 could no longer be said to be lawfully in his possession by virtue of the issue of the prescription, because subsequently they had been replaced as a result of a new prescription. And it is said that anyhow they were only prescribed for this f particular course of treatment and he had no business to be in possession of them once that treatment had been concluded. And finally, and perhaps more important, what is said is this, that possession involves at least two elements: (1) actual custody of the article, and (2) a mental element, the fact that one knows that one has got it, what is called 'animus', and so, it is said, inasmuch as the appellant thought that these tablets had been disposed of by being dissolved when the jeans were washed, he then g ceased to be in possession of them, albeit they remained in his drawer, and he was not in possession of them at all until he rediscovered them some nine or ten months later. That, it is submitted, was a rediscovery and a new possession and not by virtue of any prescription. There it is. That is the argument.

This court has been referred to two cases of possession of drugs: one is *Lockyer v Gibb*¹, and the other a case that went to the House of Lords, *Warner v Metropolitan h Police Comr*². In those cases a good deal of consideration was given to this question of 'animus'; they were cases which dealt with something very different, i.e. the question whether an article ever came into the individual's possession at all. For example, supposing somebody slipped an article into your pocket, and it was there without your knowledge, the question whether it could be said to be in your possession; or if a lady was going along in the street with one of those shopping baskets and somebody put an article into that without her knowledge, whether it could be said that i it was in her possession; or supposing somebody handed a parcel to you which you believed to contain scent, but which in fact contained drugs, whether it could be said that those drugs were in your possession.

It seems to this court that that is a very different problem from a case where an article is undoubtedly in your possession and the question is whether, because you forget you have got it or because you think wrongly that it has been disposed of or destroyed, it could be said that it has gone out of your possession, even though it remains physically in a drawer in your house. a

2 [1968] 2 All ER 356, [1969] 2 AC 256

As to the argument about the second prescription, as it were, destroying the legality of the first, and the end of the treatment rendering drugs prescribed in the course of it no longer lawfully in your possession, this court thinks nothing of those points. As I have indicated, we have not seen this prescription. There is no reason to suppose that it is stated on the face of it that the drugs prescribed must be consumed not later than a certain date or anything of that sort. Nor indeed that at the conclusion of the treatment the doctor said 'Well, now, you must hand back any surplus drugs which you may have'. I suppose there are very few households in this country which do not contain a few little bottles with some drugs, possibly specified in the schedule, which have not been consumed in the course of treatment and which have been kept at the back of the medicine cupboard and forgotten all about. To suggest that a member of the household who received them under a perfectly proper lawful prescription is in unlawful possession once the treatment is concluded seems to this court to be an extraordinary proposition. b

Dealing with what seems to be the one real problem here, namely the question whether drugs lawfully acquired by a prescription in some way pass out of your possession if you forget you have got them, or if you think that they have been destroyed, whereas in fact they are still sitting in your drawer, this court thinks that it cannot be said that simply as a result of your mistaken belief or your failure to appreciate that you have got them, thereby they in some way passed out of your possession. Of course it is quite different if I hand something over to someone else to destroy, so that it passes from my custody and they officiously put it back in my house without telling me; or if I throw something into the dustbin for disposal by the borough council and some officious person decides that I could not have meant to throw it away and puts it back in my house, so that I have it without knowing. In those sort of cases you are back on the problem which was dealt with in the cases to which I have referred, i.e. whether something comes into your possession. But if you have got it in your custody and you put it in some safe place, and then forget that you have got it, and discover a year or two later, when you happen to look in that particular receptacle that it is still there, it seems to this court idle to suggest that during those two years it has not been in your possession. It has been there under your hand and control. If it has not been in your possession, in whose possession has it been? Presumably it has not been in a state of limbo. Again with the question of destruction. This court thinks that it is idle to say that if mistakenly you think your mother has dissolved the tablets which you put in the pocket of your jeans, whereas in fact they are still in the drawer, they have in some way passed out of your possession. They have never left your care and control and accordingly, as I think, remain in your possession. c

For these reasons the court thinks that this conviction was entirely wrong. These drugs came into the appellant's possession by virtue of a perfectly lawful prescription. They were in his possession when he rediscovered them, and in his possession still as a result of that prescription. In the judgment of this court in those circumstances this appeal must be allowed and this conviction must be quashed. d

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords granted, the court certifying under s 33 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 that a point of law of general public importance was involved, i.e. whether the possession of drugs originally obtained by lawful means became unlawful when, in the belief that the original supply had been disposed of or destroyed, a further supply was prescribed, and the original supply was rediscovered. e

- b Contract – Stranger to contract – Benefit of contract – Agreement between creditors of stranger – Agreement to forfeit loans in specified circumstances – Action by one of creditors to enforce debt against stranger after loan forfeited under agreement – All parties before court in proceedings to enforce debt – Stay of proceedings – Dismissal of action – Company – Plaintiff, as director, owed sum on loan account by company – Loan by finance company to company – Covenant by plaintiff and co-directors not to reduce respective loans to company until loan repaid to finance company – Separate agreement between plaintiff and co-directors that if any of them voluntarily resigned before loan repaid to finance company moneys due to him from company would be forfeited – Company not a party to agreement – Plaintiff voluntarily resigning – Plaintiff claiming from company sum owing to him – Co-directors joined as defendants claiming declaration that plaintiff's loan forfeited – Co-directors entitled to judgment – Stay of proceedings against company – Dismissal of plaintiff's action against company – Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, s 41.

The plaintiff and the second and third defendants were brothers and co-directors of the first defendants ('the company'). Prior to 1967 the company had been financed by loans from each of the brothers. In 1968 additional finance was required and, on 22nd March, a mortgage on the company's properties was executed under which e a finance company agreed to advance £40,000 to the company, repayable over ten years. All three brothers were parties to this mortgage agreement and each of them covenanted with the mortgagees that they would not reduce the amounts of their respective loans to the company below the sum shown in the accounts on 31st March 1966. On 22nd March 1968 the brothers entered into an agreement between themselves which was to remain in force until the loan by the finance f company had been repaid. By cl 4 and 5 it was agreed that in the event of any director voluntarily resigning he would immediately forfeit all money due to him from the company by way of his loan account and that if this event occurred the remaining directors might use the money in furtherance of the intention to repay the loan from the finance company but not in such a way as to benefit themselves personally. In June 1968 the plaintiff voluntarily resigned as a director and claimed g payment from the defendant company of the sum in his loan account at the date of his resignation. The company denied that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief claimed and joined the co-director brothers as defendants. They adopted the company's defence and further counterclaimed for a declaration that the sum due to the plaintiff on the loan account had been forfeited. The issues arose whether the agreement between the brothers was intended to create legal relations and h whether the defendant company could rely on a term in the agreement when it was not a party to it even though the agreement was for the company's benefit.

Held – (i) The agreement between the plaintiff and the second and third defendants was intended to affect the legal rights of all concerned and was therefore legally binding and enforceable (see p 85 h and p 86 a c and d, post).

j (ii) The second and third defendants, having proved the contract between the plaintiff and themselves and having proved a breach of it by the plaintiff, or an undoubted intention on his part to repudiate it, were entitled to a declaration that the provisions of the agreement were binding on the plaintiff (see p 87 f and j, post).

(iii) The company, on the other hand, was not entitled to rely directly on the terms of the agreement since it was not a party to it (see p 87 g and p 89 g, post); nevertheless, the second and third defendants having made out an unambiguous case and succeeded on their counterclaim, and all parties, including the promisees under the agreement and the party to be benefited, being before the court, it was a proper case for a stay of all further proceedings under s 41^a of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925 in the plaintiff's action against the company; furthermore, since the reality of the matter was that the plaintiff's claim had failed, the right course was to dismiss the claim rather than merely to grant an order staying further proceedings (see p 89 a and j to p 90 a, post).

Beswick v Beswick [1967] 2 All ER 1197 considered.

(iv) Accordingly the plaintiff's claim would be dismissed and judgment given for the second and third defendants on the counterclaim with a declaration that, in the events which had happened, the plaintiff was not entitled to call on the defendant company to repay to the plaintiff the whole or any part of the sum due from the company to the plaintiff on his loan account on the date of his resignation (see p 90 b, post).

Action

By a writ issued on 13th August 1969 the plaintiff, Brian Grenville Snelling, brought an action against John G Snelling Ltd ('the defendant company') claiming £15,268

a Section 41, so far as material, provides: 'No cause or proceeding at any time pending in the High Court or the Court of Appeal shall be restrained by prohibition or injunction, but every matter of equity on which an injunction against the prosecution of any such cause or proceeding might formerly have been obtained, whether unconditionally or on any terms or conditions, may be relied on by way of defence thereto: Provided that— (a) Nothing in this Act shall disable either of the said courts, if it thinks fit so to do, from directing a stay of proceedings in any cause or matter pending before it . . .'

a as money payable by the defendant company to the plaintiff being money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant company between 1st April 1962 and 31st March 1968.

By their defence the defendant company admitted that they were, on 21st March 1968, indebted to the plaintiff on loan account in the sum of £15,219 8s 1d but, by paras 2 to 7 of their defence, alleged: 2. At all material times up to 26th June 1968 the plaintiff was a director of the defendant company. The other directors of the defendant company were the plaintiff's brothers, John Peter Snelling and Barrie Walter Snelling ('the brothers') and the plaintiff's father, John Grenville Snelling. 3. By a mortgage dated 22nd March 1968 and made between the defendant company of the first part, certain other companies of the second, third and fourth parts, the plaintiff and the brothers of the fifth part and Credit for Industry Limited ('the lender') of the sixth part, in consideration of the loan by the lender to the defendant company of the sum of £40,000 (repayable over ten years as therein provided) the defendant company and the other companies charged the properties therein mentioned with the repayment of the loan. By cl 10 of the mortgage the plaintiff and the brothers covenanted with the lender (inter alia) that so long as any money remained owing to the lender on the security of the mortgage they would not nor would any of them reduce the amounts of their loans to the defendant company beyond the balances of such loans as shown by the accounts of the defendant company as on 31st March 1966 without the previous written consent of the lender. 4. The amount of the plaintiff's loan account shown by the accounts of the defendant company as at 31st March 1966 was £6,443 16s 5d. Moneys remained owing to the lender on the security of the mortgage. The lender had not given its written consent to the plaintiff to call in the loan account. 5. By an agreement in writing dated 22nd March 1968 and signed by the plaintiff and the brothers it was agreed (inter alia) e (a) in the event of any of the parties to that agreement voluntarily resigning as a director of the defendant company such party would immediately forfeit all moneys declared with the defendant company by way of loan account; (b) the resigning director's loan account was to remain with the defendant company and was to be used by the remaining directors as they should think fit in furtherance of the parties' f declared intention to repay the mortgage loan, but not in such manner as to benefit themselves personally. 6. On or about 26th June 1968 the plaintiff voluntarily resigned as a director of the defendant company. 7. At a meeting of the board of directors of the defendant company held on 22nd May 1969 the following resolution was passed:

g 'Upon consideration of the difficulties occasioned to the Company by the resignation of Brian Grenville Snelling RESOLVED (1) that the loan Account of Brian Grenville Snelling be cancelled (2) that the sum of £15,219. 8. 1d thus released be carried to a separate account by way of provision for repaying the C.F.I. Loan, the same to be written off from time to time or otherwise against the first £15,219. 8. 1d repaid hereafter to C.F.I. by the Company.'

h This resolution was duly acted on by the defendant company.

On 6th January 1970 the brothers, John Peter Snelling and Barrie Walter Snelling, were joined as second and third defendants to the action. They adopted the defence of the defendant company and, by their counterclaim, repeated the allegations contained in paras 2 to 7 of the defence, and claimed (1) a declaration that the sum of £15,219 8s 1d (formerly due from the defendant company to the plaintiff on loan account) had been forfeited and was applicable in accordance with the resolution j of the board of directors of the defendant company passed on 22nd May 1969; alternatively, (2) a declaration that the plaintiff was not entitled to reduce the sum owing to him by the defendant company on loan account to less than £5,443 16s 5d except as provided in cl 10 of the mortgage dated 22nd March 1968.

By his reply and defence to counterclaim the plaintiff admitted paras 2 to 4 and 6 of the defence and further admitted that a document described as an agreement dated 22nd March 1968 had been signed by the plaintiff and the second and third defendants and that it contained the provisions set out in para 5 of the defence. The plaintiff denied, however, that this document was intended to give rise to legal relations and contended that in any event the agreement was not supported by consideration moving from any party to it.

27th May. ORMROD J. This is a tragic and alarming case—tragic because it has divided the plaintiff from the second and third defendants who are his brothers and formerly were his co-directors in a family company which is the first defendant; alarming, because it raises a number of difficult and interesting points of law and, for a family of this kind, the costs involved in resolving such points are likely to be ruinous.

The contention which has been put forward on behalf of the plaintiff, and on which he must succeed if he is to win this action, amounts to the proposition that, having made an agreement with his two brothers in an effort to put the family company on a secure business footing, he is entitled to repudiate it with impunity and that the court is not only impotent to restrain him, but is required to use its authority and its powers to assist him to carry his repudiation into effect by obtaining a judgment against the company in defiance of his agreement. The proposition is not attractive, but it is said to be the inevitable conclusion from the present state of the law. If that is correct the case for reform requires no further emphasis.

The relevant facts may be stated quite shortly and are not in dispute. The defendant company, John G Snelling Ltd, is a private company formed in 1945 to take over the building business founded by Mr John Snelling senior. In due course Mr Snelling's three sons, John Peter, Barrie Walter and Brian Grenville, joined him and became directors and shareholders of the company. Peter and Barrie are the second and third defendants to this action; Brian is the plaintiff. During the 1960's the business expanded and three or four other companies were acquired. In 1966 serious disputes began to arise between the brothers over the conduct of the business, the details of which are not relevant to this case. The business or businesses were also in need of additional finance and, early in 1967, negotiations were started with a finance house called Credit for Industry Ltd. Up to this time finance had been found from within the business itself. Mr Snelling senior over a long period had adopted the policy of ploughing back into the business part of its earnings. The three brothers had followed the same policy so that each of them was shown in the company's books as a creditor for a considerable sum. By March 1968 these loan accounts stood as follows: Peter Snelling (the second defendant), £16,000; Barrie Snelling (the third defendant), £14,000; Brian Snelling (the plaintiff), £15,000.

By February 1968 relations between the plaintiff and his two brothers had reached breaking point. In that month the plaintiff wrote a long letter addressed to 'The chairman and directors of John G Snelling Group of Companies'. (The chairman was the father of the three brothers.) In this letter he set out at length his opinion of his brothers in very uncomplimentary language and put forward suggestions for reorganising the business. The details are irrelevant except insofar as they demonstrate the extent of the estrangement between the brothers. There is, however, a passage in the letter which in the light of later events is of considerable importance in this case. That paragraph reads as follows:

'Failing written agreement, signed by the shareholders, at an Extraordinary General Meeting of the Companies, to the principle of either of the first two proposals by 29th February, 1968, I shall, on 31st March, resign my directorships

- a of all the Companies within the group and withdraw my assets from the Companies by the best means available.'

This letter came at a critical moment for the defendant company because negotiations with Credit for Industry Ltd were on the point of being concluded and, on 22nd March 1968, a mortgage was executed under which Credit for Industry Ltd agreed to advance £40,000 to the defendant company repayable over ten years by quarterly instalments of £1,000 plus interest, on the security of a mortgage on the property owned by the defendant company and its associated companies. All three brothers were parties to this mortgage and by cl 10 thereof, each of them covenanted with the mortgagees that so long as any part of this loan was unpaid they would not reduce the amounts of their respective loans to the company below the figure shown in the accounts of the defendant company on 31st March 1966. So far as the plaintiff is concerned the amount of his loan to the defendant company on 31st March 1966 stood at £6,443. It is relevant to observe that none of the three brothers was guarantor for the defendant company.

Between the date of the plaintiff's letter and the execution of the mortgage on 22nd March 1968 great efforts were made to overcome the dissensions which had been dividing the brothers. By 7th March 1968, as is shown by the minutes of the defendant company for that date, agreement had been reached between them and a draft had been prepared for their consideration. On that day the draft was approved and the third defendant was deputed to prepare a formal document for signature. This was done and according to the minutes for 21st March 1968, it was signed by each of the three brothers. The agreement itself was dated 22nd March 1968 (i.e. the same date as the mortgage). The vital terms of this agreement are cl 4 and 5 by which the three directors, Peter, Barrie and Brian, agreed that in the event of any director voluntarily resigning, or without reasonable cause neglecting the duties required of him, he would immediately forfeit all moneys due to him from any of the companies by way of loan account 'or similar'. Clause 5 provided that if this event occurred the companies and the remaining directors might use the moneys 'in furtherance of the intention to repay the loan from Credit for Industry but not in such a way as to benefit themselves personally'. There were other provisions covering such contingencies as resignation or neglect of duties for reasons beyond the director's control; cl 8 provided that the agreement would remain in force until the Credit for Industry loan had been repaid.

The efforts to compose the differences between the plaintiff and his two brothers proved in the end unavailing and the agreement between them short-lived, for on 27th June 1968 the plaintiff offered to resign his directorship. In a long letter in reply the third defendant offered once again to let bygones be bygones, but on 28th June 1968 the board formally accepted the plaintiff's resignation as a director. In August 1968 there was correspondence between the solicitors for the plaintiff and the defendant company about the plaintiff's loan account and other matters and ultimately, by a minute dated 22nd May 1969, the defendant company resolved to cancel the plaintiff's loan account and at the same time to carry it to a separate account by way of provision for repaying Credit for Industry's loan.

On 13th August 1969 the plaintiff issued the writ in this action against the defendant company, claiming payment of the sum of £15,268 as money due from the defendant company to the plaintiff. This, of course, represents the amount which was shown in the defendant company's accounts as due to the plaintiff on loan account as at the date of his resignation.

The defence which was delivered on 20th October 1969 is obviously a document which has been carefully and deliberately drafted by the pleader. It admits that on 21st March 1968 (i.e. the day on which the agreement between the brothers was signed by them) there was due to the plaintiff by the defendant company the sum of £15,219 8s 1d. (Nothing turns on the difference in the figures.) Paragraph 2 pleads the fact that up to 26th June 1968 the plaintiff and his brothers and his father were directors of the defendant company. Paragraph 3 recites the mortgage to Credit for Industry Ltd, and in particular cl 10, to which I have already referred, under which the plaintiff and his brothers agreed not to reduce the amount of their loans below the figures at which they stood in March 1966. Paragraph 4 alleges that the lenders had not consented to the plaintiff calling in the loan. Paragraph 5 recites the relevant parts of the agreement between the brothers of 22nd March 1968. Paragraphs 6 and 7 recite the plaintiff's resignation and the resolution of the defendant company dated 22nd May 1969 to cancel the plaintiff's loan account and to open the separate account which I have mentioned. The defence concludes with a denial that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief claimed or any other relief.

Later Peter and Barrie Snelling applied to be joined as defendants to the action and on 6th January 1970 it was ordered that they be joined as defendants. On 19th March 1970 they delivered a defence and counterclaim adopting the defendant company's defence and counterclaiming for a declaration that the sum due to the plaintiff on the loan account had been forfeited and is now applicable in accordance with the resolution of 22nd May 1969. The plaintiff delivered a reply and defence to counterclaim, the substance of which is that the document signed by all the brothers on 22nd March 1968 was not intended to give rise to legal relations and was not supported by any consideration.

It should be stated immediately that no attempt has been or could be made on behalf of the defendants to rely on cl 10 of the mortgage as a defence. It is pleaded simply as a relevant fact leading up to the agreement between the three brothers. In fact it appears that Credit for Industry was prepared to release the plaintiff from his obligation provided that the other parties agreed. This clause is, of course, a covenant with Credit for Industry Ltd, and not a covenant inter se between the plaintiff and the defendants or any of them. Similarly, it has not been argued on behalf of the plaintiff that there was no consideration to support the agreement between the brothers. Counsel for the plaintiff did, however, argue in the alternative that this agreement was too vague or uncertain to be enforced.

The resulting situation is at once simple and complex. To the layman the position is that the plaintiff having agreed to forfeit his loan account, i.e. to forgo the debt due to him by the defendant company, if he resigned his directorship voluntarily, has resigned voluntarily and is now suing the defendant company to obtain payment of the debt which he had agreed to forgo. To the lawyer, however, the difficulties are formidable because the case raises two points of principle, first whether the agreement of 22nd March 1968 between the three directors and brothers was intended to create legal relations and, secondly, if it is an agreement which is capable of enforcement at law whether the defendant company, for whose benefit it was made, can rely on it. I do not know whether this is the first case in which in similar circumstances this practice has been adopted of adding as defendants the actual parties to such a contract, but I have not been referred to any similar case other than *Beswick v Beswick*¹, to which I will return later. I confess that I would have welcomed guidance over the procedural problems which may flow from my decision. It will be convenient to deal first with counsel for the plaintiff's submission that the agreement between the second and third defendants and the plaintiff contained in the document dated 22nd March 1968 was not intended to give rise to legal relations between the three of them, and his alternative submission that the terms of the agreement are too vague to be enforceable at law.

On the first of these submissions I heard evidence from the plaintiff and the third defendant, and am satisfied that this agreement was intended by all of them to be binding on them, both in honour and in law. I do not think that it occurred to any of them that there was any difference between these two concepts. The agreement a (and I refer to it as an agreement because it is expressed to be an agreement) was drafted by the third defendant who is, of course, a businessman and a layman, without legal assistance. He explained that they were all most anxious that no hint of the disagreements which were tearing the business apart should leak out to employees or to other persons and that was the reason why the lawyers were not called in. It is said, first of all, that this was a family matter, an attempt to compose the differences between members of the family, and that such arrangements were not intended to have legal effect. If it is to be suggested that this case is an extension of the principle in *Balfour v Balfour*², the answer is that the circumstances of that case were wholly different. In this case the family relationship had already been destroyed by dissensions; the plaintiff on the one hand, and the second and third defendants on the other, were at arm's length as is shown by the plaintiff's letter of February 1968. Nothing but the biological tie remained between them.

c Then it is said that this arrangement was essentially a statement of mutual intentions for the future and no more, or, in other words, that it was in substance a letter of intent. Considerable reliance is placed on the contents of the document itself in support of this argument. Undoubtedly, the first three clauses do not amount to anything which could be regarded as an operative agreement and do contain expressions of intention for future co-operation. Clause 6 is a mere statement of fact, and d cl 10 contains this phrase 'but by signing this agreement we are declaring our joint intentions' and so on, and goes on to refer to 'the court'. It must, however, be remembered that this document was drafted by a layman and that recitals are not uncommon in documents prepared by lawyers.

e To deal properly with this submission, however, it is necessary to consider the background against which the document came to be prepared. I have already described the position in some detail. It is only necessary to add that all the directors of the defendant company were greatly concerned about its financial stability and were well aware of the effect of a withdrawal of the assets of any one of them from the business. They had made mutual wills to provide against the death of one or other of them, the defendant company had taken out life policies on their lives to cover, f to some extent, the contingencies of the defendant company having to meet a call for a loan account to be paid off. They had already agreed to cl 10 of the mortgage but there remained one threatening possibility—the resignation of a director and a call for payment of the balance of his loan account so long as the mortgage debt to Credit for Industry Ltd remained outstanding. How real and immediate this threat was can be seen from the plaintiff's letter of February which I have already read. The third defendant said in evidence that it was a repetition of this situation g which they wished to guard against and that it was against this contingency that the agreement was made. Moreover, the plaintiff's was not the only threatened resignation which had been received during those troubled days.

All these facts point, in my judgment, very strongly to the view that this agreement of 22nd March was intended to be as full a protection as they could devise. While h they did not consider in terms whether they intended to be legally bound, it is difficult to suppose that they would have gone to such trouble to record so obvious a debt of honour or to phrase the agreement in terms of 'forfeit' unless they intended legal consequences to flow from the agreement. The third defendant explained cl 10 in terms which I accept without hesitation. He said quite simply that he did not know what his draft might achieve or what effect it might have in law, so he included this clause as an indication of what they had tried to do. The reference by an unsophisticated layman who clearly had nothing but the interests of the business at heart i to 'the court' suggests to me that he did envisage the possibility of legal proceedings arising out of this agreement. There are other indications in the document which point the same way. The phrase in cl 4 'we hereby agree' is often used as a way of emphasising the formal significance which it is intended should be attached to the words which follow it. The care which has been taken to provide for various contingencies and the provision in cl 5 limiting the way in which the loan account is to be dealt with after forfeiture, all presuppose that the agreement will affect the legal rights of all concerned, including the company. a

The alternative contention is that the terms of this agreement are too vague or uncertain to be enforced. So far as the terms relating to forfeiting the loan account are concerned it is apparent on the face of the document that great care has been taken to express the intention of the parties as clearly and as fully as possible. Clauses 4, 7 and 8 are quite clear even though some ambiguity might be read into cl 8. No real difficulty, however, arises in interpreting it. Clause 5 may be more difficult to interpret but there again the intention is clear; the difficulty lies in the mode of its implementation rather than in ascertaining its meaning. In dealing with an agreement such as this, prepared by laymen themselves for themselves and each being on an equal footing with the others, the court, in my judgment, ought not to seek for ways of avoiding it but rather to do its utmost to give effect to it if it is possible to do so. For these reasons my conclusion is that the agreement between the plaintiff and the second and third defendants is legally binding and enforceable, unless there is some other reason why effect should not be given to it. None has been suggested or pleaded. No question arises, therefore, of penalty or of possible relief from the forfeiture. b

I now turn to the position of the defendant company. Counsel for the plaintiff contends that it has no defence to this claim and relies on the well-known case, *Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd*³, in which the House of Lords re-affirmed unequivocally the common law doctrine that in the absence of a trust or agency, a person cannot rely on a term in a contract to which he is not a party even if he is the person whom the contract is intended to benefit. Counsel contends, therefore, that the company cannot rely on the agreement between the brothers and claim that in the events which have happened the plaintiff's loan account has been forfeited, and consequently is no longer payable to him. There can be no doubt that this proposition is supported by the speeches in the Midland Silicones case³. Counsel for the defendants, however, submits that some of the broad statements of principle in that case went too far and relies on the later case of *Beswick v Beswick*⁴. c

These cases are examples of two different situations. In the Midland Silicones case³ a firm of stevedores sought to rely on a clause limiting liability for damage to goods in transit which was contained in a contract between the carriers, the United States Lines, and the consignees, the Midland Silicones Ltd. It was held that since they were not parties to that contract they were not protected by the clause limiting liability, although damage by stevedores was expressly referred to in it. In *Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd*⁵, Dunlops sought to sue Selfridges for breach of contract made by wholesalers with Selfridges which contained a clause fixing a minimum price below which Selfridges agreed not to sell tyres manufactured by Dunlops. The purpose of the clause was to enable Dunlops to operate a price maintenance scheme for their own benefit. It was held that since Dunlops were not a party to the contract with Selfridges they could not sue on the contract. d

*Beswick v Beswick*⁴ was a wholly different case. The late Mr Beswick made a written agreement with his son under which he assigned his business of a coal merchant to the son in consideration of a promise by the son to pay him a weekly sum as a consultant to the business for the rest of his life and thereafter to pay his widow an annuity at the rate of £5 per week. After the father's death the son repudiated the agreement and refused to pay the widow's annuity. In an action by the widow e a as administratrix of her late husband's estate, it was held that as administratrix she was entitled to a decree of specific performance of the agreement to pay the annuity to herself as beneficiary. In *Tweddle v Atkinson*⁶ Mr Tweddle senior made an agreement with a Mr Guy that each would pay a certain sum of money to the plaintiff, John Tweddle, the son, who had married Mr Guy's daughter. Mr Guy failed to pay and after the death of both Mr Tweddle senior and Mr Guy, John Tweddle sued Mr Guy's executors on the agreement. He failed because he was not a party to the contract.

b The critical difference between *Beswick v Beswick*⁷ and these other cases is that in all of them a person who was not a party to the contract from which the obligation in question arose, was attempting to enforce the contract. In *Beswick*⁷, the widow in her capacity as the personal representative of her deceased husband's estate, was the promisee under the contract out of which the son's obligation to pay the annuity of £5 per week arose. She was therefore entitled to enforce the obligation. The fact that in her personal capacity she was the beneficiary of it was clearly irrelevant. The principle appears to be that if the right parties, that is, the promisee and the promisor, are before the court the action will be maintainable although the nature of the remedy which the court will grant will depend on the circumstances of each case. Thus in *Tweddle v Atkinson*⁶ the promisee was Mr Tweddle senior and, so he, or his personal representatives, could have enforced the agreement against Mr Guy's estate although Mr Tweddle junior was the beneficiary. On the principle of *Beswick v Beswick*⁷ the court would presumably have ordered the defendant to perform the obligation to pay the agreed sum to Mr Tweddle junior. In *Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd*⁸ the wholesalers could have sued Selfridges for breach of contract in selling the tyres below the minimum price but in that case it seems probable that the court would have decided that nominal damages would be an adequate remedy. In the *Midland Silicones*⁹ type of case, on the other hand, the promisee is not in a position to initiate any form of proceedings except possibly a motion under s 41 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, for a stay of proceedings pending between the promisor, on the one hand, and a person intended to be benefited or protected by the contract on the other.

f The conclusion, therefore, is that the second and third defendants have proved the contract between the plaintiff and themselves and have proved a breach of it by the plaintiff or at any rate an undoubted intention on his part to repudiate it. They are consequently entitled to judgment on the counterclaim, but the nature of the relief to which they are entitled requires further consideration. The defendant company, on the other hand, is not entitled to rely directly on the terms of this contract, but whether the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against it on the claim also requires further consideration. To give judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant company for the amount claimed in the statement of claim and judgment for the second and third defendants on the counterclaim would be absurd, unless, which is clearly not the case here, the second and third defendants could be adequately compensated in damages. So far as they are concerned a judgment against the defendant company would frustrate the very purpose for which their agreement with the plaintiff was made. The next problem is to consider the relief to which they are entitled. They have claimed a declaration that the amount shown in the plaintiff's loan account has been forfeited to the defendant company and is now applicable in accordance with the resolution of the board of directors of the defendant company passed on 22nd May 1969, but I feel some doubt whether this is the appropriate form of declaration. They are certainly entitled to a declaration that the provisions in the agreement of 22nd March 1968 are binding on the plaintiff. Had these provisions been worded positively and not negatively, e g as a promise by the resigning director to release the company from its indebtedness to him, I think that, on the authority of *Beswick v Beswick*¹⁰, this would have been an appropriate case on the facts in which to order specific performance of that promise in whatever was the appropriate form. Similarly, had the second and third defendants themselves taken proceedings, before the plaintiff issued his writ, to restrain the anticipated breach they would have been entitled to an injunction restraining him from demanding payment by the company of his loan account. Had he subsequently started an action against the company it would, presumably, have been stayed as an abuse of the process of the court. But what is the appropriate form of order when the second and third defendants have been joined in the plaintiff's action, and succeeded on the counterclaim? This is the procedural problem on which I would have been grateful for authoritative guidance. An injunction against the plaintiff restraining him from pursuing the action is excluded by the provisions of s 41 of the 1925 Act. But once it is established that the second and third defendants are entitled to enforce their contract with the plaintiff, the court is bound to take some action against the plaintiff. One solution would be to stay all further proceedings in the action between the plaintiff and the defendant company, either under the proviso to s 41 or under the court's inherent jurisdiction to protect its process from abuse.

Counsel for the plaintiff has called my attention to *Gore v Van der Lann (Liverpool Corpn intervening)*¹¹ in the Court of Appeal and I must now deal with it. In that case the Liverpool corporation applied to the court under s 41 to stay an action which was proceeding between the plaintiff and a conductor of one of their buses for damages for negligent management of a bus. The plaintiff, as an old-age pensioner, had been given a permit by the corporation entitling her to travel at reduced rates or free on their buses. The permit contained a provision exempting the corporation and their servants, including the defendant conductor, from liability for negligence to persons travelling under it. The corporation sought to protect their conductor, who had been sued personally, by alleging that the plaintiff's claim was a fraud on the corporation, but they failed. The primary ground of the decision of the Court of Appeal was that the permit was a contract (not a licence as the corporation contended) and as such was caught by the Road Traffic Act 1960, s 151, which rendered any such exemption clause illegal. But, in the alternative, the Court of Appeal held that the exemption clause was not sufficiently precise in its terms to justify the granting of a stay of the plaintiff's action against the conductor. So in the present case counsel for the plaintiff says that there was no specific promise by the plaintiff not to sue the defendant company and consequently the court should refuse to stay the plaintiff's action. I do not think that the Court of Appeal can have intended to lay down a general proposition of law that the court will not stay proceedings in such circumstances unless the plaintiff has expressly undertaken not to sue. Such a ruling would appear to put an unjustified fetter on the discretionary powers of the court under s 41. I do not think that the Court of Appeal intended to go further than to say that the promise which is to be enforced by the granting of a stay must be clear and unambiguous. In this connection an observation by Kelly CB in *Slater v Jones*¹² is of assistance. In that case, which concerned the effect of a resolution of creditors to accept a composition, he said:

‘... I think that a person who is bound by such a resolution is also bound, by necessary implication, not to sue the debtor before the time for payment comes, and until default is made.’

So here, it is a necessary implication of cl 4 of the agreement of 22nd March 1968 that the plaintiff will not sue the company.

a In my judgment, therefore, the second and third defendants have made out an unambiguous case and have shown that the interests of justice require that the plaintiff be not permitted to recover against the defendant company. It follows that this is a proper case in which to grant a stay of all further proceedings in the plaintiff's action against the company.

b Counsel for the defendants, however, has submitted that he is entitled to go further and ask for the plaintiff's claim against the company to be dismissed. He relies on three cases: *West Yorkshire Darracq Agency Ltd v Coleridge*¹³, *Hirachand Punamchand v Temple*¹⁴ and *Re William Porter & Co Ltd*¹⁵. In the West Yorkshire case¹³ all the directors of a company in liquidation agreed to forgo their respective claims to outstanding directors' fees. The liquidator was a party to an oral agreement to this effect. Horridge J held that the company was entitled to rely on the agreement as a good defence to a subsequent claim by one of the directors for his fees. The basis of the judgment was that the company, through the liquidator, was a party to the agreement, although no consideration moved from it to the plaintiff. In *Re William Porter & Co Ltd*¹⁵ the opposite situation arose. Following a resolution passed by the directors of a company that no directors' fees be paid until a further resolution was passed, the trustee in bankruptcy of the governing director submitted a proof in the liquidation of the company for subsequent fees due to the director. The liquidator rejected the proof. Simonds J held that the company was not a party to any agreement with the directors and that the West Yorkshire case¹³ did not apply. He went on to hold, however, that the directors, by assenting to the postponement or abrogation of their rights, had induced the company to a course of conduct from which it could have abstained. He, therefore, upheld the rejection of the proof by the liquidator.

e In the present case the defendant company was not specifically mentioned as a party to the agreement of 22nd March 1968 which, in form at any rate, was an agreement between the three directors concerned. On the other hand, the minutes of the defendant company contain references to it and it was an important item on the agenda at two meetings of the board of directors. There being no liquidator there was no physical person other than the directors who could have been a party to it on behalf of the defendant company, and they themselves never applied their minds to the question whether the company was to be a party to it or not. They regarded the business, the company and its associated companies, and themselves as an amalgam for most purposes, and their intention was to act for the benefit of the amalgam. However, it is not possible to distinguish this case on its facts from *Re William Porter & Co Ltd*¹⁵ in this respect. I must, therefore, hold that the defendant company was not a party to the agreement. I have no evidence that the defendant company took any action in reliance on the agreement which it would not otherwise have done so that Simonds J's decision cannot be relied on to support the view that the company is entitled to have this action dismissed.

h *Hirachand Punamchand v Temple*¹⁴, which was a wholly different case on the facts, concerned a claim by the plaintiff against a debtor on a promissory note, whose father had paid to the plaintiff a lesser sum than that due in settlement of their claim. The Court of Appeal dismissed the claim on two grounds: first, that the promissory note was extinct and, therefore, could not be relied on, and, secondly, that it would be an abuse of the process of the court to allow the plaintiff to sue.

j I am inclined to the view that in a case such as this where the promisees under the agreement and the party to be benefited by the agreement are all before the court and the promisees have succeeded against the plaintiff on their counterclaim, the right view is that the plaintiff's claim should be dismissed. I think that this accords with s 41 of the 1925 Act. If the action was left with no more than an order staying further proceedings on the claim, the plaintiff could start another action only to have it also stayed and so on ad infinitum. The reality of the matter is that the plaintiff's claim fails and the order of the court ought, if possible, clearly to reflect that fact. a

15 [1937] 2 All ER 361

Accordingly, I think the plaintiff's claim should be dismissed and that there should be judgment for the second and third defendants on the counterclaim, together with a declaration in appropriate terms. My present view, subject to hearing counsel further, is that it ought to be in the form of a declaration that in the events which have happened the plaintiff is not entitled to call on the defendant company to repay to the plaintiff the whole or any part of the sum of £15,219 8s 1d, formerly due from the defendant company to the plaintiff. I would prefer not to make any declaration about the resolution passed by the company on 22nd May 1969, because the question whether the second limb of this resolution is in accordance with the agreement has not been gone into sufficiently thoroughly before me. b

Judgment for the second and third defendants on their counterclaim and a declaration that the plaintiff was not entitled to call on the defendant company to repay to the plaintiff the whole or any part of the sum of £15,219 8s 1d formerly due from the defendant company to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's action against the defendant company dismissed. c

- b This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the city and county of Bristol in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Bristol on 26th February 1971. The respondent, Francis Jackson, an inspector of police, preferred informations against the appellant, Reginald Valentine, charging, inter alia, that he either by himself or through his employee, Peter Macey, had failed to admit on 8th and 13th December 1970 a police constable to certain licensed premises known as the Moulin Rouge Club in Clifton, Bristol, on the constable demanding entry in accordance with s 186 (1) of the Licensing Act 1964, contrary to s 186 (2) of that Act.
- c The following facts were, inter alia, found. The appellant was the licensee of a club called the Moulin Rouge at 72 Worrall Road, Clifton, holding a justices on-licence in respect of those premises subject to club conditions. He also held a certificate under s 68 of the 1964 Act, which was granted in respect of two raised areas used for the service of table meals on either side of a central dance floor. The general licensing hours for the division ended at 10.30 pm. The effect of the certificate was to extend the permitted hours to 11.30 pm in those restaurant areas with drinking-up time until midnight.

- d At 11.40 pm on 8th December 1970 Inspector Bates and Sergeant Ferrett parked a police car in the club's car park and approached the entrance of the club. The two glass doors on the outside of the foyer were closed. The foyer was illuminated and the doorman, Peter Macey, was standing in it. The inspector knocked on the external doors which were locked. The inspector then said: 'Open the door I want to inspect the premises.' Mr Macey replied: 'No I am not, we are closed.' The inspector said 'I am a police officer. I demand entry to inspect these premises. Open the door.' Mr Macey ignored the officer who again rang the bell and knocked on the door and said 'Fetch the manager.' Mr Macey went through the internal double doors of the foyer and at 11.44 pm reappeared with the appellant who opened the door and invited the officers into the club where the following conversation took place. Inspector:
- f 'At 11.40 pm when I came to these premises I could not enter as the doors were unable to be opened from outside. Your doorman would not open them as the club was closed. I did eventually manage to get him to fetch you. I have now gained entrance at 11.44 pm.' The appellant: 'That's my instructions. I have told the doorman not to let anyone in until he has fetched me.' Inspector: 'I am reporting you for contravening s 186 of the Licensing Act 1964.' The appellant: 'This is a private club and I will keep the doors shut and let in those people I want to.' The inspector and sergeant then went to the bar at the far end of the club looked round, found everything in order and then left. The intention of Inspector Bates and the sergeant on this evening was to carry out a routine inspection of the premises as on many other occasions. On 13th December 1970 Inspector Bates again visited the premises
- g at 1.00 am. The doors were locked but Mr Macey came into the foyer to let some persons out of the external doors. The inspector then entered and walked toward the internal doors of the foyer. At that moment Mr Macey stepped between the inspector and the doors putting his back to the doors and saying 'You're not going in there until I have fetched the manager'. The inspector said, 'Out of my way I am going to inspect the premises'. He brushed Macey aside and entered.
- h Inspector Bates then inspected the premises found everything in order and saw the appellant who said to him, 'You might as well be a member.' This visit on 13th December at 1.00 am was a further routine visit of inspection by the police. The delay caused to the inspector by Mr Macey was small, amounting to no more than a couple of seconds.
- i

It was contended for the appellant, inter alia, that the prosecution must prove that the entry by the constable was for the purpose of preventing or detecting the commission of an offence, and there must be some reasonable ground for suspecting that an offence is taking place or is about to do so; that it must further be proved that the failure to admit the constable occurred when he was not only demanding entry but also was reasonably suspecting that an offence was being, or was about to be, committed; that the licensee of club premises could close his door whenever he liked. When the doors are closed the constable must disclose his authority and without doing so he has no right of entry.

It was contended for the respondent, inter alia, that a constable could not prevent or detect the commission of offences in licensed premises unless he gained admission.

The justices were of the opinion that the delay by Mr Macey in admitting the police was wilful. The justices accepted that he was acting on the instructions of the appellant in fetching the appellant before opening the door but they thought that those instructions were in conflict with the constable's rights under s 186, and that Inspector Bates, in carrying out routine visits to the premises, was carrying them out for the purpose of supervising licensed premises and to that extent preventing or detecting the commission of offences against the Licensing Act 1964. Accordingly it was their opinion that he was demanding entry in pursuance of s 186 and that the appellant through Mr Macey failed to admit him, and they convicted the appellant.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: whether or not a constable must have a reasonable ground for suspecting that the commission of an offence was taking place or was about to take place before he can demand entry under s 186 of the Act; whether on the facts found the justices were right in convicting the appellant of the two offences.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the city and county of Bristol who had before them on 26th February 1971 a number of summonses alleging that the appellant had failed to admit, either by himself or through his employee, Peter Macey, to certain licensed premises known as the Moulin Rouge Club in Clifton, Bristol, one Police Inspector Bates, a constable of the Bristol constabulary demanding entry thereto in accordance with s 186 (1) of the Licensing Act 1964. Of the seven summonses, five were dismissed for reasons which do not concern the present appeal, but in the other summonses a conviction was entered and the appellant appeals to this court accordingly.

Section 186, which has a distinguished ancestry in the licensing law, now provides as follows. The sidenote is: 'Right of constables to enter premises.' Subsection (1) provides:

'A constable may at any time enter licensed premises, a licensed canteen or premises for which or any part of which a special hours certificate is in force under section 78 of this Act, for the purpose of preventing or detecting the commission of any offence against this Act, other than an offence under section 155 or section 157 thereof.'

Then sub-s (2) goes on to create the offence of failing to admit a constable seeking to exercise his right of entry under sub-s (1).

The facts found by the justices show that on the two occasions which gave rise to the convictions, Inspector Bates and another police officer in uniform parked a motor car in the club's car park and approached the entrance to the club demanding admission pursuant to s 186. There was nothing, according to the justices' findings, which gave rise to any specific suspicion in the minds of the police officers that any offence was at that time being committed, and indeed the justices find in regard a to the first offence that the intention of Inspector Bates and the sergeant on this occasion was to carry out a routine inspection of the premises as on many other occasions. In regard to the second offence they put the same point in somewhat similar terms; they say of the second visit that: 'It was a further routine visit of inspection by the Police.'

b The short but important point which this appeal raises is whether a police officer exercising, or purporting to exercise, his powers under s 186 must first have some grounds for suspecting that an offence is or may be committed on the premises. The alternative argument sustained by counsel for the respondent is that no such suspicion is a necessary preliminary to the exercise of this power, and that the police can therefore exercise a purely supervisory control over premises within the section by entering them as when and wherever they like, provided that they do so bona fide for the purpose of preventing or detecting the commission of an offence.

c The section, as I say, has been in the licensing law virtually unchanged ever since 1874, and there is some authority on this. The first case to which we have been referred is *R v Dobbins*¹; that again was an appeal by special case and the justices in their finding of fact in the special case came to a specific finding that the constable was visiting the house in the exercise of what he considered to be his duty, and that he sought to enter the house of the then appellant in order to prevent or detect a violation of the provisions of the Licensing Act 1874. There was nothing, as in the present case, to indicate he had any special grounds for suspicion. The justices in that case obviously took the view that this was his way of preventing or detecting offences against the licensing laws, and that provided his claim of entry was bona fide made in what he conceived to be his duty under the section, that was sufficient to justify the entry even though there was no specific ground of suspicion of a particular offence at that time.

e As opposed to that, there is a later decision, also of this court, in the contrary sense, that is *Duncan v Dowding*². That was a decision again on s 16 of the Licensing Act 1874 on which the present legislation is founded, and the main issue which was raised by *Duncan v Dowding*² was whether the licensee could be held to have wilfully refused admission to the premises to the police officer if the part of the premises
f which the police officer sought to enter was in the occupation on that night of a private party. That point, as Cave J observed, was not necessary to be decided at all, because in that case there were no specific grounds on which the police officer could sustain a belief that some particular offence was or might be committed. The decision of this court on that occasion is, in my judgment, clearly in favour of the present appellant's argument, namely that the power under s 186 of the 1964 Act cannot be exercised except when based on some suspicion of that kind. Cave J, having referred g to s 16 of the 1874 Act, then said³:

h 'That, no doubt, gives him the power to enter for that purpose. But, before the occasion for the exercise of that power can arise, he must have reasonable ground for suspecting that circumstances exist, or are about to exist, constituting a violation of some provision of the Acts. The particular violation which it was here suggested that he was desirous of preventing or detecting was that of excessive drinking. But there was nothing which could reasonably lead him to suspect that the members of the lodge were drinking to excess. It would be monstrous to suggest that the mere fact that persons are singing and playing
i in a room in licensed premises points to the inference that they are getting drunk. If it had been shewn that on previous occasions members of the lodge had been seen to leave the room in a condition of intoxication, that would have been another matter; but there was nothing of that kind here. The recorder seems to have thought that it was enough for the constable to say that he wanted to enter the room for the purpose of enforcing the law. I cannot agree.' a

That authority, standing alone, is in my judgment clear authority for the proposition that some antecedent suspicion is a prerequisite of the exercise of the power under s 186.

The only remaining authority is that of *Hinchliffe v Sheldon*⁴. This was a case in which a licensee had been charged with obstructing the police in the performance of their duty, and the question of the precise circumstances in which a police officer was entitled to enter the premises did not in my judgment arise. Lord Goddard CJ, in giving the judgment of the court, referred to s 151 of the Licensing Act 1953, which was the then current form of the legislation now contained in s 186, and having read the section he said⁵: b

'Therefore, the police have a right to go in to see whether or not there is any likelihood of an offence being committed. That is their right, and, therefore, it is their duty if they consider that circumstances call for investigation.' c

I pause to observe the reference to circumstances calling for investigation. Later on he said⁵: d

'They [the police] can go in to see whether it is likely that an offence will be committed. If they are detained from going in, that does obstruct them in the execution of their duty . . .'

Those words again, when taken in isolation, lend some force to the argument for the respondent, because although qualified to the extent that I have indicated, in that Lord Goddard CJ referred to circumstances calling for investigation, yet it might be said that standing alone they support the view that there is an unqualified right of entry as long as the police officer is acting bona fide in what he believes to be the interests of preventing or detecting the commission of an offence. e

For my part in that state of the authorities I think this court should take the view more favourable to the subject, and therefore sustain the view of Cave J in the 1887 case. I think that pending any change of the law on the part of Parliament, we ought to take the view that Cave J's judgment is still the law in this respect, and Inspector Bates in this instance did not disclose to the justices the necessary prerequisite of suspicion before demanding entry to the appellant's premises. I would accordingly allow the appeal and quash the convictions. f

BROWNE J. I agree. g

BRIDGE J. I also agree and I would only add this. If the point of construction arising in this appeal was in any way in doubt in relation to the antecedents of what is now s 186 (1) of the Licensing Act 1964, to my mind that doubt is conclusively resolved by the form of the present provision. Under the old Acts the power to enter licensed premises was related to the purpose of preventing or detecting offences against the Licensing Acts generally. Now the words with which the subsection concludes are: h

'... for the purpose of preventing or detecting the commission of any offence against this Act, other than an offence under section 155 or section 157 thereof.' j

Those are two sections which relate to the sale of alcoholic liquor out of the permitted hours and to off sales in licensed canteens.

5 [1955] 3 All ER at 408, [1955] 1 WLR at 1209

a To my mind, when Parliament has said that a constable exercising this right of entry must have as his purpose the prevention or detection of an offence of one kind and not an offence of another, it is presupposed that the constable exercising the power must suspect, and therefore must have some ground to suspect, that a particular offence is being committed. For this reason in addition to those expressed by Lord Widgery CJ, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal

On 17th October 1967 the husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of the wife's cruelty and on 6th April 1970 presented a supplemental petition on the grounds of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. By their respective answers the wife and co-respondent denied the husband's allegations of cruelty and adultery. Following the coming into force of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 the husband applied for leave to present a second petition under s 2 (1) (a) and (b) of that Act and for leave to administer interrogatories to the wife and co-respondent. On 7th May 1971 Mr Registrar Stranger-Jones granted leave for the second petition to be filed and also granted leave to administer interrogatories in the following terms:

'It is ordered that the [wife] do answer on affidavit within 28 days from today the following interrogatories. 1. Since in or about the month of February 1967 or some other date and if so what earlier date did not the [co-respondent] sleep at the former matrimonial home, 130 Lodge Hill, Welling, Kent? 2. If aye, on how many occasions did he sleep at the said address since the first occasion that he did so? 3. In what room did he sleep at the said address on any of the occasions referred to in interrogatory 1? 4. Did he not have sexual intercourse with you on any and if so how many occasions at the said address? 5. Did not the [co-respondent] provide you with any and if so what financial support since the month of March 1967 or some other and if so what later date? 6. Did you follow any and if so what gainful employment since the withdrawal of the [husband] from the said matrimonial home in or about February 1967? 7. If aye, you are requested to give particulars of each employer and the earnings you received from such employment. 8. Did you receive any financial support from the Ministry of Social Security or from other and if so what source since in or about the month of February 1967? 9. Did you have any and if so what source of income other than the allowance sent to you by the [husband] since March 1967? 10. Did you not between 9th September 1968 and 16th September 1968 go on holiday to Babbacombe, Devon, without the children of the family? 11. Did not the [co-respondent] go to Babbacombe for his holiday at the same time? 12. At what hotel did you stay? 13. At what hotel did the [co-respondent] stay? 14. What was the number of the room into which you registered and in what name did you register at the said hotel? 15. What was the number of the hotel room into which the [co-respondent] registered and in what name did he register? 16. Did you arrange for the two children of the family to be left with the next door neighbour (naming her) while you went on holiday to Babbacombe as aforesaid during the said period? 17. Did you not commit adultery with the [co-respondent] between 9th September 1968 and 16th September 1968 at Babbacombe, Devon? 18. Did you not commit adultery with the [co-respondent] at his residence? If aye, on what date or dates did you do so?

'And it is further ordered that the . . . Co-Respondent do answer on affidavit within 28 days from today the following interrogatories 1. Since in or about the month of February 1967 or some other date and if so what earlier date did you sleep at the former matrimonial home of the [husband] 130 Lodge Hill, Welling, Kent? 2. If aye, on how many occasions did you sleep at the said address since the first occasion that you did so? 3. In what room did you sleep at the said address on any of the said occasions when you slept at the said address? 4. Did you not have sexual intercourse with the [wife] on any and if so how many occasions at the said address? 5. Did you not provide the [wife] with any and if so what financial support since the month of March 1967 or some and if so what later date? 6. Did you make any and if so what gifts to the [wife] since in or about the month of February 1967? 7. Did you not between 9th September 1968 and 16th September 1968 go on holiday to Babbacombe, Devon? 8. Did not the [wife] go to Babbacombe for her holiday at the same time? 9. At what hotel

Did you not commit adultery with the [wife] between 9th September 1968 and 16th September 1968 at Babbacombe, Devon? 13. Did not the [wife] spend the night on one or more (and if so how many) occasions at your residence? 14. Did you not commit adultery with each other on the occasions referred to in interrogatory 13?

The wife appealed against both orders of the registrar. The appeal was heard in chambers and judgment delivered in open court. During the hearing of the appeal an amended set of interrogatories to be answered by the wife was presented to the judge in the following terms:

- c '1. Did not the co-respondent stay the night at your residence since February 1967? 2. If aye, give the best particulars you are able as to the number of occasions on which he stayed. 3. If the answer to interrogatory 1 is in the affirmative, you are required to state whether the co-respondent shared a bedroom with you on any occasion and whether there were any occasions when he did not share a bedroom with you on staying the night. 4. Did you not stay on holiday with the co-respondent in Babbacombe, Devon, in September 1968? 5. If aye, did you share a bedroom with him at a Hotel on such holiday? 6. Did you not after February 1967, stay the night at the residence of the co-respondent at 23, Raleigh Court, Lynne Road? 7. If aye, give the best particulars you are able as to the number of occasions on which you did. 8. If the answer to interrogatory 6 is in the affirmative you are required to say if you shared a bedroom with the co-respondent on any occasion and whether there were any occasions

30th July. PAYNE J read the following judgment. The wife in this case is appealing from a decision of Mr Registrar Stranger-Jones of 7th May 1971, under which, first of all, he granted leave to the husband petitioner to administer interrogatories to the wife, and second, granting leave to the husband to file a further petition notwithstanding that another petition and supplemental petition were already on the file. It would be convenient to deal first with the second ground of appeal, the granting of leave for a second petition.

I can deal shortly with the facts of the marriage. On 13th September 1953 the parties were married. There were two children of the marriage, a girl, now 17 years of age, and a boy, now 12. On 17th October 1967 the husband presented a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the grounds of cruelty, and he sought the discretion of the court. On 12th September 1968 there was an answer denying the cruelty. There were steps taken for discovery, and the matter remained dormant for a long time. On 6th April 1970 the husband presented a supplemental petition on the grounds of the wife's adultery with one Arthur Walker. On 13th May 1970 there was the wife's answer denying adultery, and on 27th July 1970 the co-respondent

i filed an answer denying adultery.

On 1st January 1971 the Divorce Reform Act 1969 came into operation, and the husband now wishes to present a petition under s 2 (1) (a) and (b) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 as alternatives to his former petition and supplemental petition based on cruelty and adultery. At the application before the registrar, he granted leave for the second petition to be filed, and that order is now appealed against. [His lordship then considered and dismissed this appeal.]

A more important matter is the other part of the registrar's order whereby he granted leave to the husband to administer interrogatories to the wife, those interrogatories relating to the adultery alleged between the wife and the co-respondent. In allowing the interrogatories, the learned registrar urged that an appeal should be made to one of the judges of this Division. I gather that one of his reasons was that this was, if not the first, certainly an early application of this kind to be made to this court since the Civil Evidence Act 1968, and on that account perhaps I ought to go into the matter rather more fully than otherwise I would, and it would be helpful to refer, I think, as briefly as I can to the history of this matter. a

Before 1851, and therefore before the parties to suits in the ecclesiastical courts and the Chancery Court were competent witnesses, discovery was enforced in those courts, but discovery whether by interrogatories or affidavit of documents was refused if it was sought for the purpose of proving adultery, because the courts could not compel a party to discover that which, if answered, would tend to subject him to any punishment, penalty, forfeiture or ecclesiastical censure. Adultery was regarded as an offence of such gravity that the court should apply to it the principle that no one is bound to incriminate himself. b

In 1851—this is a stage which is sometimes overlooked—the Evidence Act 1851 was passed; by s 2 of the Act the parties became competent and compellable to give evidence either verbally or by deposition, according to the practice of the court. By s 3 it was provided (inter alia) that nothing in the Act should render any person compellable to answer any question tending to criminate himself. Then followed an important section, s 4: c

'Nothing herein contained shall apply to any action, suit, proceeding or bill, in any court of common law, or in any ecclesiastical court, or in either House of Parliament, instituted in consequence of adultery, or to any action for a breach of promise of marriage.' d

So that the parties then became competent and compellable witnesses in civil proceedings, but the alteration of the law in 1851 did not extend to a suit that was founded on adultery. e

The next change came about under the Evidence Further Amendment Act 1869, which did provide for the parties to give evidence in proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery, repealing to that extent s 4 of the Evidence Act 1851. But parties were still substantially protected. Section 3 of the 1869 Act provided: f

'The parties to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, and the husbands and wives of such parties, shall be competent to give evidence in such proceeding: Provided that no witness in any proceeding, whether a party to the suit or not, shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her adultery.' g

That section was repealed and reproduced with modifications in later statutes, in particular the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, s 198, the Matrimonial Causes Act 1950, s 32 (3), and the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, s 43 (2). The prohibition against asking a witness, including one of the parties, any question tending to show that he or she had been guilty of adultery, unless he or she had given evidence in disproof thereof, was throughout extended to questions by way of interrogatories, and these were disallowed if they tended to prove adultery. The practice has been consistently followed, not least on the authority of *Redfern v Redfern*¹, and other cases. It is not uninteresting to look at *E v E*². I read from the headnote: h a 'A wife in her petition for divorce on the grounds of her husband's cruelty and adultery alleged in paragraph 4 as an act of cruelty, the wilful communication to her of a venereal disease, and in paragraph 7 she alleged an act of adultery with a woman unknown on the same date, whereby he had contracted the disease. The wife proposed to interrogate the respondent as to whether he was not suffering from venereal disease at the time in question, and whether a doctor did not attend him for it, contending that the interrogatories went solely to the charge of cruelty alleged in paragraph 4.'

b The interrogatories were:

c '(1) Were you in some and what period of the years 1903 and 1904 suffering from any and what form of venereal disease . . . (d) Did you not consult Doctor H. of Paris, or any other and what doctor, in relation to such disease, and were you not under his care and treatment in relation thereto for any and what period during the said years 1903 and 1904?'

d Bargrave Deane J in a short judgment said that he was quite satisfied that the proposed interrogatories ought not to be allowed. It was quite obvious to him that the paragraphs in the petition which had been referred to had been inverted. It was alleged in para 7 that in consequence of an act of adultery in 1903 the respondent had contracted a venereal disease, which disease the respondent was alleged in para 4 to have wilfully communicated to his wife in the same year. The summons must therefore be dismissed as by the statute the questions were inadmissible. As the matter was one of importance, should the petitioner desire to appeal, the summons would be reheard in open court for argument as he did not feel disposed at that stage to give leave to appeal.

e For reasons which appear later in this judgment, in my view the interrogatories which were disallowed in *E v E*³ would now be allowed. The whole position has now been radically changed by the Civil Evidence Act 1968, by s 16 (5) of which the following provision has been introduced:

f 'A witness in any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery, whether a party to the proceedings or not, shall not be excused from answering any question by reason that it tends to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, and accordingly the proviso to section 3 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act 1869, and, in section 43 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, the words from "but" to the end of the subsection shall cease to have effect.'

g The words which have gone, therefore, are:

'But no witness in any such proceedings, whether a party to the proceedings or not, shall be liable to be asked or be bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery unless he or she has already given evidence in the same proceedings in disproof of the alleged adultery.'

h The protection so long afforded to parties and witnesses has been removed, and, with it, the very foundation on which the practice of refusing interrogatories tending to show adultery rested. In *Skone v Skone*⁴ the House of Lords has accepted that one effect of s 16 of the Civil Evidence Act 1968 is that a husband can obtain discovery of documents against his wife and a co-respondent of letters passing between them notwithstanding that they tend to show that adultery has been committed, and in my view the section must be given the same effect with regard to interrogatories, so that questions inviting answers which tend to establish adultery may now be allowed.

j In these circumstances one must consider what interrogatories may properly be administered, and for that purpose the principles set out in *The Supreme Court Practice 1970*⁵ under RSC Ord 26, r 1, should be studied. The discretion of the judge, master or registrar exists in part for the protection of the party interrogated, and care must be exercised to ensure that the new freedom to interrogate with regard to adultery is not abused. A party charged with adultery in divorce proceedings is clearly entitled to persist in a denial of adultery contained in the pleadings and to put the other party to proof of his allegations. The other party in seeking to prove his case may make use of interrogatories if he can satisfy the court that they are permissible in the circumstances.

The principles to be followed are conveniently set out in *The Supreme Court Practice 1970*⁵ under RSC Ord 26, r 1. The first is that interrogatories which relate solely to credit are not allowed; secondly, interrogatories which relate to any matter in question in the cause or matter are admissible. Then one comes to the very important general principle⁶: '3. . . only such interrogatories will be allowed as shall be considered "necessary either for disposing fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs"', and under that heading there are examples: '(b) Interrogatories will not generally be allowed where it is plain that no admission can be obtained' and '(e) Oppressive interrogatories will not be allowed'; and, a further general principle, '4. Interrogatories as to the evidence of the party interrogated will not be allowed'. The wife is urging in this case that the interrogatories which the learned registrar has allowed were not necessary for disposing fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs, and further contends that they are oppressive.

Some assistance in this matter can be gained by examining one or two cases in which interrogatories have been allowed or disallowed. In the judgment in *Heaton v Goldney*⁷, which was a case of defamation and therefore not helpful for comparison, an observation of general application should be remembered. Vaughan Williams LJ said⁸:

'In my opinion each of the grounds on which it is alleged that these interrogatories are admissible fails. I wish to point out, before dealing with those grounds, one thing which ought to be remembered with regard to interrogatories and discovery generally. Ever since they were first invented it has been recognized that they constitute a process which might become oppressive, and be used for improper purposes; and therefore that the allowance or disallowance of interrogatories is a matter for the discretion of the judge, and they should be allowed or disallowed on the merits of the particular case.'

Then the learned lord justice went on⁸ to deal more particularly with their use in a defamation case.

In 1956 Davies J had to consider in *Ramsey v Ramsey*⁹ whether to allow a wife petitioner, who sought a decree on the grounds of desertion, to interrogate her husband as to the contents of certain letters which had been written by the wife to the husband and subsequently lost or destroyed. The learned judge said¹⁰:

'My attention was called to the well-known passage in the judgment of A. L. SMITH, L.J., in *Kennedy v. Dodson*¹¹. As was emphasised by counsel for the wife this morning, the facts of that case were far removed from those of the present case. The passage relied on for the husband was at the opening part of the judgment: "In my opinion, the legitimate use, and the only legitimate use, of interrogatories is to obtain from the party interrogated admissions of facts which a it is necessary for the party interrogating to prove in order to establish his case; and if the party interrogating goes further, and seeks by his interrogatories to get from the other party matters which it is not incumbent on him to prove, although such matters may indirectly assist his case, the interrogatories ought not to be admitted.” On the pleadings as they are before me in the present suit, are these interrogatories as to how many letters the wife wrote to the husband, when he got them, and what was in them, and the matters that might there be elicited, necessary for her to establish her case? In my opinion, they are not. The case is one of simple desertion, and I cannot say that it is necessary for her to prove these letters in establishing her case.’

The interrogatories which had been allowed by the registrar in that case were therefore disallowed on appeal.

c In *Hulbert v Hulbert*¹² the wife filed a petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty alleging assaults and violence to which the husband pleaded not guilty. The wife filed a supplemental petition in which she alleged that the husband had sent Christmas cards to mutual friends in which he defamed her with the object and effect of embarrassing and distressing her, and when he was visiting Holland he had spoken to women and made similar defamatory statements. In addition, he visited the Law Society in London and informed the legal aid department that the wife had provided the national assistance board with false information. To the additional charges of cruelty the husband pleaded not guilty of the cruelty as therein alleged. The wife obtained from the registrar leave to administer interrogatories in respect of the additional charges of cruelty, and the husband appealed to Willmer J in chambers. The question was whether the interrogatories were permissible in a divorce suit for cruelty. The matter went from the judge who had approved the registrar’s order allowing the interrogatories to the Court of Appeal, where Denning LJ, having stated the facts, said¹³:

f ‘The first five interrogatories are put for the purpose of saving costs . . . of calling the witnesses from different parts of this country and from Holland; and the last interrogatory, about the Law Society, is put because it is said that there may be a statutory prohibition preventing a witness from the Law Society giving that evidence. On this account it is said these interrogatories are necessary for fairly disposing of the case and for saving costs.’

g ‘In these circumstances, I think that, in cases alleging cruelty or desertion, interrogatories are permissible where they are necessary either for fairly disposing of the case, or for saving costs. Rule 23 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950¹⁵, is quite general. It must be read with Ord. 31, r. 1 and r. 2, of the Rules of the Supreme Court. I agree that in a divorce case it is rare that interrogatories are necessary for fairly disposing of the case or for saving costs; but in this case the registrar and the judge were so satisfied, and I agree with them.’

h In my view, it would be neither possible nor prudent to attempt within these principles to define further the kind of questions which might be allowable in cases founded on adultery, and I shall do no more than indicate what interrogatories I would myself allow in the present case.

i The husband alleges that his wife has committed adultery (1) since 1967 at the matrimonial home in Kent; (2) at the co-respondent’s residence on occasions unspecified until after discovery; and (3) between 9th and 16th September 1968 at an hotel in Devon. In support of the application for interrogatories, the husband's solicitor has filed an affidavit in which it is explained that the above allegations are founded on statements made to the husband by his daughter, who is now with the wife, and on enquiries made at the hotel in Devon by an enquiry agent. The husband is disinclined to call either of the children as witnesses if the suit is contested, and I have every sympathy with that view. Insofar as his interrogatories are otherwise justifiable, I would regard the release of the children as a further sound reason for allowing them. As to the enquiry agent, it is said that his evidence so far about the holiday in Devon does not sufficiently identify the wife and the co-respondent, and it would be foolish and unwarrantable to spend time and incur costs in further possibly extensive investigations if the wife and co-respondent are disposed to make such admissions as would lead to an inference of adultery failing adequate explanation of their conduct. It is not difficult to see that a great deal of expense could be wasted in the investigation of an hotel case if at the trial admissions were to be made rendering the investigations otiose.

I approach the present interrogatories against that background. The husband presented to the learned registrar one set of interrogatories¹⁶ against the wife and one against the co-respondent. All were allowed by the registrar. In the course of argument on the appeal, an amended set of interrogatories¹⁷ was presented to me. In my opinion, both sets of interrogatories, with one or two exceptions, are objectionable and I do not think it would be helpful to deal with them seriatim. The following observations will suffice, and I will deal first with the interrogatories¹⁶ allowed by the registrar against the wife. (1) The first three questions put to the wife are too vague, are oppressive, and ask for evidence rather than admissions of fact. Question 2, 'On how many occasions did he sleep at the said address' cannot be justified. (2) The fourth interrogatory, 'Did he not have sexual intercourse . . .?' This is the allegation which is denied in the answer and which the husband has to prove. He may seek to prove it by asking the court to draw inferences from facts admitted in proper interrogatories, but not by a bald question in this form. This question in my view must be disallowed. (3) The questions relating to financial support, questions 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9, are not necessary for fairly disposing of the case or saving costs and should be put to the wife in the witness box if the suit is contested. Insofar as they relate to the wife's earnings, they are relevant in maintenance proceedings. (4) Questions 10 to 17 relating to the holiday in Devon are admissible but should be redrafted. (5) Question 18, 'Did you not commit adultery . . .?' is not, in my view, allowable on the ground that the wife and the co-respondent are entitled to put the husband to proof of this allegation. As I have said already, if he obtains on the other interrogatories such admissions as lead to an inference of adultery, the wife and co-respondent must go into the witness box if they wish to rebut the inference, and they can then be cross-examined as to adultery.

As to the interrogatories to be answered by the co-respondent¹⁶ and allowed by the registrar: (6) Questions 1 to 4, and 13 and 14, are in my view objectionable for the reasons given in para (1) above. (7) Questions 5 and 6 relating to financial support and gifts are objectionable for the reasons given in para (3) above. (8) Questions 7 to 10 are in my view permissible, but should be redrafted. (9) Question 11 is objectionable as seeking evidence rather than admissions. (10) Question 12 is objectionable for the reasons given in para (5) above.

The interrogatories contained in the second set¹⁷ put before me on the appeal display many of the same defects, and some are even more objectionable and oppressive. For example, interrogatory 2: '... give the best particulars you are able as to the number of occasions on which he stayed'; and interrogatory 3: '... state whether the co-respondent shared a bedroom with you on any occasion, and whether there were any occasions when he did not share a bedroom with you on staying the night'.

a In these circumstances, whilst I allow the appeal against the registrar's order, it occurs to me that it might be more helpful to all concerned in this case if I were to indicate what interrogatories I would myself be prepared to allow as necessary within the principles described in this judgment. I have accordingly drafted a set of interrogatories which I would give leave to administer as follows.

Interrogatories to be answered by the wife

b ' (1) Did you not between the 9th and 16th days of September, 1968, or on other and what days in the said month, spend a holiday in Devon? (2) Did not the co-respondent, Arthur Edward Walker, accompany you on the said holiday? (3) Did you not during the said holiday stay at the Babbacombe Cliff Hotel, Babbacombe? (4) Did not the co-respondent during the said holiday stay at the said Babbacombe Cliff Hotel? (5) Did not you and the co-respondent at the said hotel on any and what dates during the said holiday occupy the same bedroom? (6) Did you not sign the register at the Babbacombe Cliff Hotel, Babbacombe? (7) Did not the co-respondent sign the register at the said hotel? (8) Did you and the co-respondent, or either of you, sign the said register in the name of Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Walker? (9) If "yes", did you and the co-respondent together occupy room No. 22 at the Babbacombe Cliff Hotel, Babbacombe, from the 9th September, 1968, for one week or for some other and what period during the said month? If the answers to interrogatories 3 and 4 are "no", then: (10) Did you not during the said holiday stay at the Babbacombe Hotel, Devon? (11) Did not the co-respondent during the said holiday stay at the said Babbacombe Hotel? (12) Did not you and the co-respondent at the Babbacombe Hotel on any and what dates during the said holiday occupy the same bedroom?'

e Then I should allow a similar set of interrogatories, with necessary amendments, against the co-respondent.

In those circumstances, the appeal against the registrar's order allowing the interrogatories is allowed.

Practice Direction

CHANCERY DIVISION

h Practice – Chancery Division – Hearings by judges outside London – Court and chambers procedure.

1. On and after 1st January 1972 causes and matters proceeding in the Chancery Division, and applications in such proceedings, may be heard by a judge sitting outside London, subject to and in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Rules of the Supreme Court and this practice direction.

j 2. Burgess V-C, the vice-chancellor of the Lancaster Palatine Court, has been requested by the Lord Chancellor to sit as a judge of the High Court for the hearing of proceedings assigned to the Chancery Division (including proceedings in the Companies Court) with certain specified exceptions. He will sit at Liverpool, Manchester and Preston and, time permitting, at Leeds and Newcastle upon Tyne. These towns may therefore be regarded for the purpose of RSC Ord 33, r 1, as places at which sittings of the High Court are authorised to be held for the trial of proceedings within Burgess V-C's jurisdiction. In deciding whether to direct the trial of an action, or order the hearing of an originating summons, at any such place, it will be relevant to consider whether the proceedings are within Burgess V-C's jurisdiction and, particularly in the case of Leeds or Newcastle upon Tyne, whether he is likely to be available to take the case there. Subject to those considerations, it is to be expected that a cause or matter proceeding in the district registry of Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle upon Tyne or Preston will be ordered to be tried or heard at one of those places if both parties so wish.

3. Where a cause or matter within Burgess V-C's jurisdiction is proceeding in the district registry of Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle upon Tyne or Preston any application in the cause or matter for hearing by a judge should be made or adjourned to Burgess V-C and not to a judge in London, unless the parties otherwise agree or the court at or before the hearing otherwise directs on the ground that it is impracticable or inexpedient to make or adjourn the application to Burgess V-C.

4. If, pursuant to para 3, an application has been made to Burgess V-C or, as the case may be, to a judge in London, any subsequent application to a judge in the cause or matter should, unless the court at or before the hearing otherwise directs, be made to Burgess V-C or to a judge in London respectively.

5. The practice indicated in para 3 and 4 above should be followed, with the necessary modifications, in regard to the hearing of originating motions and petitions.

6. If parties to any cause or matter within the jurisdiction of Burgess V-C serve notices of motion on one another and one such notice is for hearing before Burgess V-C and the other is for hearing by a judge in London both notices shall be deemed to be for hearing before Burgess V-C, but no party on whom notice of motion has been served shall serve a cross-notice of motion for hearing elsewhere than at the place of hearing of the first motion.

7. In the case of a cause or matter proceeding at the Royal Courts of Justice or in any district registry other than those of Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle upon Tyne or Preston, the hearing of the proceedings must, unless special arrangements are made, be ordered to take place in London, Liverpool, Manchester or Preston. The master or district registrar must not fix an action for trial, or adjourn an originating summons for hearing, by a judge elsewhere unless the proposed place of trial is one at which sittings of the High Court are authorised by or on behalf of the Lord Chancellor to be held for the hearing of the particular case or cases of that class. This is unlikely to be possible except in special circumstances, for example, where it would be difficult for the witnesses to come to London. In such a case and subject to para 8, before the master or district registrar is asked to fix a local venue, enquiries should be made through the appropriate circuit administrator. It may occasionally be possible to arrange for a judge of another Division to take the case, or for Burgess V-C to sit outside his normal area or for another circuit judge to be requested to sit as a judge of the High Court for the purpose of trying the case. Exceptionally, a judge of the Chancery Division might agree to go out and hear the case. If the master or district registrar is satisfied that it is administratively possible for a case to be tried outside London, Liverpool, Manchester or Preston he must still determine judicially whether to order such a trial and must hear all parties on the question, and, if so requested, adjourn it to the judge.

8. Although Leeds and Newcastle upon Tyne may be regarded as authorised places for the purposes of RSC Ord 33, r 1, enquiries should be made of the local district registrar before a case proceeding elsewhere is fixed for trial at either of those places.

By the direction of the Vice-Chancellor and with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor.

London Borough of Ealing v Race Relations Board

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD DONOVAN^a, VISCOUNT DILHORNE, LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE, LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA AND LORD KILBRANDON

b 2nd, 3rd, 4th NOVEMBER, 16th DECEMBER 1971

Race relations – Discrimination – National origins – Discrimination on ground of nationality – Exclusion of non-British subject from council's housing list – Whether discrimination on ground of national origins – Race Relations Act 1968, ss 1 (1), 5 (c).

c Declaration – Jurisdiction to grant – Exclusion of jurisdiction by statute – Necessity for clear exclusion – Proceedings in pursuance of a determination of the Race Relations Board – Whether statutory procedure ousting jurisdiction to grant declaration to alleged discriminator – Race Relations Act 1968, s 19 (1), (2), (10).

The council, which was the local housing authority, maintained a register of all applications for housing accommodation and a list of persons transferred from this register to the housing waiting list. The council adopted rules for the transfer from the register

d to the list. Rule 3 (1) stipulated that an applicant must be a British subject within the meaning of the British Nationality Act 1948. In 1966 and 1968 Z, who was then a Polish national, submitted a housing application to the council, which declined to put him on the waiting list because he was not a British subject as required by r 3 (1). A complaint was made to the Race Relations Board on behalf of Z. The board formed the opinion that the council had unlawfully discriminated against Z

e on the ground of his 'national origins' under ss 1 (1)^b and 5 (c)^c of the Race Relations Act 1968. In June 1969 the board notified the council of their opinion and sought to secure a settlement between the parties and an assurance that the council's action would not be repeated. The council, after rejecting two requests by the board, issued a summons claiming declarations against the board and Z that they were entitled to decline to place Z on the housing list on the grounds that he was not,

f at the material time, a British subject. The board contended that the court had no jurisdiction to grant the declarations sought on the grounds that proceedings under the 1968 Act other than in accordance with s 19 (1)^d of the Act were expressly forbidden by s 19 (10)^e, that the provisions of the Act laid down a complete and exclusive code for such proceedings, and alternatively that, if the court had jurisdiction, in the exercise of its discretion it should refuse to make the declarations.

g Held – (i) The court had jurisdiction to grant a declaration, for clear words were necessary to oust the jurisdiction of the court and there were none in the 1968 Act; since the proceedings with which s 19 of the 1968 Act was concerned were proceedings brought by the board, the prohibition in s 19 (2)^f on the bringing of 'proceedings

h b Section 1 (1) is set out at p 109 j to p 110 a, post

c Section 5, so far as material, provides: 'It shall be unlawful for any person having power to dispose, or being otherwise concerned with the disposal, of housing accommodation, business premises or other land to discriminate . . . (c) against any person in need of any such accommodation, premises or other land by deliberately treating that other person differently from others in respect of any list of persons in need of it.'

j a Section 19 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 110 h, post

e Section 19 (10), so far as material, is set out at p 111 a, post

f Section 19 (2) provides: 'Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any enactment or rule of law relating to the jurisdiction of county courts, proceedings under this section in England and Wales may be brought in a county court for the time being appointed to have jurisdiction to entertain such proceedings by an order made by the Lord Chancellor and shall not be brought in any other court.'

under this section' in any courts other than nominated county courts related only to proceedings brought by the board; furthermore the proceedings instituted by the council were not brought 'against' any person in respect of an act which was unlawful by virtue of Part I of the Act and accordingly the prohibition on such proceedings in s 19 (10) did not apply to the council (see p 108 b to d, p 109 e, p 111 b and c, p 113 g, p 117 a and p 120 j, post).

(ii) The case was a proper one for the court to exercise its discretion to grant a declaration since there was no dispute as to the facts and the legality of the council's action depended solely on the construction of the 1968 Act (see p 109 e, p 111 e, p 113 g, p 117 a and p 120 j, post).

(iii) (Lord Kilbrandon dissenting) The council were entitled to a declaration that by declining to place Z on the housing list on account of his not then being a British subject the council did not commit a breach of s 5 (c) of the 1968 Act; the expression 'national origins' in s 1 (1) of the Act indicated a person's connection by birth with a particular group of people who could be described as a 'nation' and did not mean the same thing as 'nationality' in the sense of citizenship of a particular state; by refusing to place Z on the housing list the council had discriminated against him on the ground of his nationality at the time when the applications were made and not on the ground of his 'national origins' (see p 109 a, b and e, p 112 a, b, h and j, p 113 b to e, p 116 b, h and j and p 117 f, h and j, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by the Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses of the London Borough of Ealing ('the council') and a cross-appeal by the Race Relations Board ('the board') against a decision of Swanwick J dated 23rd October 1970, and reported [1971] 1 All ER 424, holding that he had jurisdiction to grant the declarations sought by the council against the board and Stanislaw Zesko that the council's conduct in refusing to place Mr Zesko on their list of applicants who were transferred to the housing waiting list maintained by the council as the local housing authority did not constitute unlawful discrimination within the meaning of the Race Relations Act 1968, but refusing to grant the declarations sought on the ground that the council's conduct did constitute unlawful discrimination under the Act. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Donovan.

J G Le Quesne QC and K C L Smithies for the council.

R A MacCrindle QC and Anthony Lester for the board.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16th December. The following opinions were delivered.

a VISCOUNT DILHORNE. The late Lord Donovan's opinion is now in print, and he was in favour of allowing the appeal.

b LORD DONOVAN. My Lords, the appellant council ('the council') is the housing authority for the borough of Ealing. As such it keeps a register of all applications for housing accommodation within the borough and a waiting list containing names transferred from that register. A points scheme adopted by the council, which takes into account among other things the time the applicant has been waiting, governs the allocation of council accommodation to those on the waiting list. Another rule, r 3 (1), of the council governing admission to the waiting list reads thus: 'An applicant must be a British Subject within the meaning of the British Nationality Act, 1948.' That Act defines a British subject as including both British subjects and Commonwealth citizens.

c In 1966 and again in 1968 a Mr Zesko, a Polish national of excellent antecedents and character, sent in an application to the council for housing accommodation describing himself therein as a Polish national. On each occasion because of the rule just quoted the council declined to put him on the waiting list.

d Section 1 (1) of the Race Relations Act 1968 ('the 1968 Act') enacts that a person discriminates against another for the purposes of the Act if—

'on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origins he treats that other, in any situation to which section 2, 3, 4 or 5 below applies, less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons . . .'

e Section 5 of the Act deals specifically with discrimination against a person in the matter of the disposal of housing accommodation and makes such discrimination unlawful.

f A complaint on behalf of Mr Zesko was lodged with the Race Relations Board now operating under the 1968 Act ('the board') that in the foregoing circumstances the council were in breach of s 5. In accordance with the Act the board investigated the complaint and formed the opinion that it was well-founded. So it proceeded, as required by the Act, to try and secure a settlement and an assurance against repetition of such alleged discrimination. Taking the view, however, that it had committed no unlawful act, the council, on 21st November 1969, issued in the High Court an originating summons claiming a number of declarations against the board, of which it is sufficient to quote no 5:

g ' . . . that the Council are and were at all material times entitled to decline to place Zesko upon their housing waiting list on the grounds that he was not at the material time a British Subject but was on the contrary a person of foreign or alien nationality.'

h It is the board's case that the High Court had no jurisdiction to grant any such declaration or indeed any of the other reliefs asked for in the originating summons; and they so contended when the summons was heard by Swanwick J¹ in October 1970. The contention is based primarily on certain of the provisions which govern the right of the board to bring civil proceedings in England and Wales and which are contained in s 19 of the 1968 Act.

j The striking feature of these provisions is that the board is confined to bringing proceedings in certain nominated county courts and in those alone. The judge is to be assisted by two assessors having special knowledge and experience of problems connected with race and community relations. The board may sue for an injunction or for damages or for both; and for a declaration that an act is unlawful under the provisions of the Act. A right of appeal is given to the Court of Appeal on questions of fact or law.

All this, says the board, amounts to a comprehensive and exclusive code of proceedings for problems of race and community relations. Under it the board itself cannot go to the High Court and seek a declaration. Why, therefore, should its opponent be allowed to do so? It is to be observed in this connection, however, that the board's opponent can initiate no action of any kind in the nominated county court. He must sit down and wait until he is taken there by the board.

Other arguments were used by the board in support of its contention which are set out in the judgment of the learned judge². In my opinion, their persuasive force was small and they were adequately disposed of by him in his reserved judgment. He went on to say, quite rightly, that clear words are necessary to oust the jurisdiction of the High Court and there are none in the Act of 1968. Nor can any necessary implication to that effect be drawn from its language. His observations were prompted by Viscount Simonds's remarks in *Pyx Granite Co Ltd v Ministry of Housing and Local Government*³ that:

'It is a principle not by any means to be whittled down that the subject's recourse to Her Majesty's courts for the determination of his rights is not to be excluded except by clear words. That is, as McNAMER, J., called it in *Francis v. Yiewsley & West Drayton U.D.C.*⁴ a "fundamental rule" from which I would not for my part sanction any departure.'

I certainly can see no justification for ousting the jurisdiction of the High Court in the manner desired by the board; and I proceed, therefore, to consider the substance of the originating summons.

The question which it raises is one of construction: namely, whether the refusal of the council to place Mr Zesko's name on their housing waiting list was discrimination against him on the ground of 'national origins' within the meaning of s 1 (1) of the 1968 Act. The council did not use the expression 'national origins' in this context. It simply applied its rule that every applicant wishing to be placed on its waiting list for housing accommodation must be a British subject within the meaning of the British Nationality Act 1948; and at the time Mr Zesko was a Pole. Had 'discrimination' been defined in s 1 (1) as including discrimination on the ground of nationality, the council's rule would clearly have fallen foul of it. So the question comes to this: do the words 'national origins' amount for present purposes to the same thing as 'nationality'?

The Act itself contains no definition of 'national origins'. It must, I think, mean something different from mere nationality, otherwise there would be no reason for not using that one word, as indeed the Act does in later provisions to which I shall have to refer. But looking at the matter from the point of view of a would-be discriminator on the grounds of 'national origins' what sort of matters would he take into account which were not simply present nationality?

One example which readily suggests itself is that of a naturalised person. The would-be discriminator may say, 'Yes, I know he has become a naturalised British subject, but he was born a German and I bear a grudge against all such persons'. Any consequent discrimination could then be said to be on the ground of national origins, i.e. the nationality received at birth. If this is what 'national origins' means, this difficulty arises for the board, namely, that the council plainly did not reject Mr Zesko's application because he had been born a Pole but because at the moment of his application he was not a British subject. Had he been, there is no doubt (in the light of subsequent events) that he would have been put on the waiting list, despite his Polish origin. I am conscious that it may be said that this is still discrimination on the ground of national origins, and that the fact that these have remained unchanged makes no difference; but of this I am not convinced. Four grounds of discrimination only are specified in s 1 (1). Discrimination on any other ground, e.g.

a religion or politics, is not unlawful under the Act. When one finds that the council was indifferent to Mr Zesko's national origins but concerned only with his present nationality, and present nationality is not expressly made a ground of possible discrimination, I hesitate to assert that nevertheless it is.

b It is argued alternatively by the board that the phrase 'national origins' is wide enough by itself to embrace nationality and in many cases this may be so. But the Act of 1968 is dealing with discrimination on grounds existing at the time it occurs; and I find 'national origins' a very inapt phrase to embrace present nationality.

c There are certain provisions in the Act which expressly mention 'nationality'. Thus, s 8 (11) preserves the legality of selecting for employment a person of a 'particular nationality' or descent if the work requires attributes especially possessed by such person. Section 27 (9) preserves the legality of present or future rules restricting employment in the service of the Crown or of certain prescribed public bodies to persons of particular birth, citizenship, nationality, descent or residence. Both sides rely on these provisions. The board argues that 'national origins' is thus shown to include nationality otherwise the provisions would, to this extent at least, be otiose. The council replies that if the true construction of 'national origins' does not include present nationality, saving provisions like ss 8 (11) and 27 (9) cannot be extended so as to achieve that result; it being common for such clauses to err on the side of caution. I think there is force in the council's reply and I do not think the provisions in question shed a crucial light on the interpretation of 'national origins' in s 1 (1).

e If the council is to be stigmatised as being guilty of an unlawful act under the 1968 Act I think that conclusion ought to be reached with reasonable confidence. Giving the rival arguments the best consideration I can I must say that I do not feel that measure of confidence. Instead, I still feel much doubt about it; and in that state of mind I would allow this appeal and make the declaration suggested by my noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne. It follows from what I have previously said that I would dismiss the cross-appeal.

f I should perhaps add that since these proceedings were begun Mr Zesko has become a naturalised British subject and been placed on the housing waiting list. This does not render the proceedings academic since he would have lost the benefit of a certain amount of waiting time, assuming that the contentions advanced on his behalf had been correct.

g VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, on 15th June 1965 the council adopted certain 'Conditions and Rules of Acceptance of Housing Applications'. One of the conditions was that to be accepted on the council's waiting list and to be assessed under the points scheme, the applicant 'must be a British subject within the meaning of the British Nationality Act, 1948'. Presumably it was in the council's opinion not right to allot council houses to aliens when so many British people were wanting houses.

h On 30th August 1966 a Mr Zesko applied to the council for a house. In his application form he stated that he and his wife were Polish and had been born in Poland. In fact his nationality was Russian for we were told that at the time of his birth Poland formed part of Russia and that in fact he was born in Siberia. His application was rejected on the ground that he was not a British subject. Mr Zesko had a fine war record, and, when he applied for naturalisation, he was granted it. He then renewed his application for a house and was put on the waiting list. The only effect j this appeal may have so far as he is concerned, is that if it is dismissed, the council will have to treat him as if he had been put on the waiting list when he first applied, in which event he will gain an advantage in the housing queue.

The Race Relations Act 1968 came into operation on 25th November 1968 (s 29 (3)). Section 1 (1) is in the following terms:

'For the purposes of this Act a person discriminates against another if on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origins he treats that other, in any situation to which section 2, 3, 4 or 5 below applies, less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons, and in this Act references to discrimination are references to discrimination on any of these grounds.’ a

Discrimination is made unlawful in respect of the provision of goods, facilities or services by s 2, in relation to employment by s 3, in relation to membership of trade unions, employers’ and trade organisations by s 4 and in relation to housing accommodation by s 5. b

On 2nd June 1969 the board’s chief conciliation officer wrote to the council telling them that the board had considered the complaint made by the Anglo-Polish Conservative Society on behalf of Mr Zesko that the council had unlawfully discriminated against him by refusing to consider his application for housing as he was not a British subject. He said that the board had formed the opinion that the council had acted unlawfully and contrary to s 5 (c) of the Act and he sought in accordance with s 15 (3) (b) of the Act to seek a settlement of the differences between Mr Zesko and the council and an ‘assurance against any repetition of the unlawful act or the doing of further acts of a similar kind’. c

No such assurance was forthcoming as the council maintained that they had not acted unlawfully as alleged; and on 14th November 1969 the chief conciliation officer wrote saying that the board had decided to maintain their opinion that unlawful discrimination had occurred. He again asked formally whether the council was prepared to reach such a settlement and give such an assurance but he imagined that the answer would be in the negative and said: d

‘The Board would then have to determine whether or not to bring proceedings. However, they would defer their determination until after the High Court proceedings had been disposed of.’ e

High Court proceedings were instituted—in the light of the foregoing, it would seem with the agreement of the board—on 21st November 1969, by originating summons claiming five declarations. The action was heard by Swanwick J⁵. At the hearing counsel for the board contended that the court had no jurisdiction to grant the relief claimed and, alternatively, if it had jurisdiction, in the exercise of its discretion it should refuse to make any of the declarations claimed. Swanwick J rejected these contentions but held that there had been unlawful discrimination against Mr Zesko and dismissed the summons. From his decision the council have, with leave, appealed direct to this House, and the board have again contended that there is no jurisdiction to grant the relief claimed and, alternatively, that if there is jurisdiction, in the exercise of discretion relief should not be granted. It will be convenient to consider these two contentions first. f

‘Civil proceedings may be brought in England and Wales by the Race Relations Board, in pursuance of a determination of theirs under section 15 of, or Schedule 2 or 3 to, this Act and not otherwise, in respect of any act alleged to be unlawful by virtue of any provision of Part I of this Act . . .’ h and that in such proceedings an injunction or damages or an injunction and damages or ‘a declaration that that act is unlawful by virtue of that provision or any other provision of the said Part I’ may be claimed. Section 19 (2) provides that proceedings under the section may be brought in a county court appointed to have jurisdiction to entertain such proceedings by the Lord Chancellor ‘and shall not be brought in any other court’. Section 19 (10) inter alia provides: j a '... except as provided by [this Act] no proceedings, whether civil or criminal, shall lie against any person in respect of any act which is unlawful by virtue only of a provision of Part I of this Act.'

b The proceedings instituted by the council were not brought against any person in respect of any act which is unlawful by virtue of Part I, and s 19 (10) therefore does not apply to them. Section 19 (2) is expressed to apply to 'proceedings under this section'. Proceedings under the section are proceedings by the board and it is those proceedings which cannot be brought in any other court than one appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Section 19 (2) does not, therefore, prevent the institution of proceedings such as those in this case. Proceedings brought by the board under the section must be in pursuance of a determination of the board under s 15 or Sch 2 or 3 'and not otherwise' and 'in respect of any act alleged to be unlawful' by virtue c of the Act. Section 19 and ss 20-24 all deal with the enforcement of the Act by the board. I can find nothing in the Act which ousts the jurisdiction of the courts to grant a declaration. The council are not bringing any proceedings to which s 19 applies.

d I therefore reject this contention of the board. Whether any of the declarations sought should be made is a matter of discretion. A borough council, accused by the board of having acted unlawfully in the administration of its housing scheme, may well seek to have the allegation disposed of one way or the other at the earliest possible moment. If they do not do so, and have to wait to see whether the board decides to institute proceedings, they may be left in doubt about how to deal with applicants for houses. If the board is right, it is only if the board starts proceedings e that the council can clear itself of the imputation cast on its conduct. Where, as in this case, there is no dispute as to the facts and where the legality of the council's action depends and solely depends on the construction of the Act, the issue of an originating summons is a convenient procedure for determining the question of construction. If the council is entitled to any of the declarations it claims, I see no reason to refuse in the exercise of discretion to make a declaration. I therefore reject the board's second contention.

f Whether the council acted lawfully or unlawfully depends on the meaning to be given to the words 'national origins' in s 1 (1). Those words appear in s 1 (1) (repealed by the 1968 Act), s 5 (1) and s 6 (1) of the Race Relations Act 1965. Our attention was not drawn to their use in any other Act and in neither Race Relations Act is the meaning to be given to these words defined. They must have been intended in the 1968 Act to have the same meaning as they had in the 1965 Act and I propose first g to consider whether the 1965 Act throws any light on the meaning to be given to them.

The long title to that Act is in the following terms:

'An Act to prohibit discrimination on racial grounds in places of public resort; to prevent the enforcement or imposition on racial grounds of restrictions on the transfer of tenancies; to penalise incitement to racial hatred; and to amend section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936.'

h Section 1 (1) provides that it is unlawful for, inter alia, proprietors of places of public resort 'to practise discrimination on the ground of colour, race, or ethnic or national origins'. Section 5 (1) makes it unlawful to withhold a licence or consent to the disposal of a tenancy on the same grounds and s 6 (1) makes it an offence to do certain acts with intent to stir up hatred 'against any section of the public in Great Britain distinguished by colour, race, or ethnic or national origins'. The words quoted in these three sections show the meaning to be attached to the word 'racial' in the long title. j

The question to be decided in this appeal is whether discrimination in favour of British subjects within the meaning of the British Nationality Act 1948 and against aliens is discrimination on the ground of 'national origins'.

'Nationality', in the sense of citizenship of a certain state, must not be confused with 'nationality' as meaning membership of a certain nation in the sense of race. Thus, according to international law, Englishmen and Scotsmen are, despite their different nationality as regards race, all of British nationality as regards citizenship. Thus further, although all Polish individuals are of Polish nationality qua race, for many generations there were no Poles qua 'citizenship'⁶. Just as 'nationality' can be used in these two senses, so can the word 'national'. Bearing in mind the racial objects of the 1965 and 1968 Acts, and that the words 'national origins' with the other words with which it appears explain what is meant by the word 'racial' in the long title, I think that the word 'national' in 'national origins' means national in the sense of race and not citizenship.

The long title of the 1968 Act is in the following terms:

'An Act to make fresh provision with respect to discrimination on racial grounds, and to make provision with respect to relations between people of different racial origins.'

And again the use of the words 'colour, race or ethnic or national origins' in s 1 (1) show the content of the word 'racial'.

The word 'nationality' does not appear in the 1965 Act. In the 1968 Act it appears in two places. Section 8 (1) of that Act states:

'Section 3 above [the section dealing with employment] shall not render unlawful the selection of a person of a particular nationality or particular descent for employment requiring attributes especially possessed by persons of that nationality or descent.'

Section 27 (9) is in the following terms:

'Nothing in this Act shall—(a) invalidate any rules . . . restricting employment in the service of the Crown or by any public body prescribed for the purposes of this subsection by regulations made by the Treasury to persons of particular birth, citizenship, nationality, descent or residence . . .'

In both ss 8 and 27 'nationality' is used in the sense of citizenship of a state. It was argued for the board that these references to nationality would not be necessary unless nationality in the sense of citizenship of a state was comprehended in the words 'national origins', for, it was said, if that were not the case there would be no need to refer to it in these saving clauses. I am not convinced by this reasoning that one should on this account construe the words 'national origins' in both Acts, for the meaning must be the same in both, as including nationality. I think that it is likely that these references to nationality were made ex abundanti cautela, it being realised that the interpretation to be given to 'national origins' might lead to difficulties.

As a step towards determining whether there has been unlawful discrimination one has to consider the characteristics of the individual alleged to have been discriminated against and then to decide whether he was discriminated against on account of his colour, race or ethnic or national origins. Consideration of those matters involves consideration of his antecedents. Mr Zesko's race was Polish. His national origins were Polish. Was he discriminated against on that account? If that was the ground of the discrimination it was not removed by his naturalisation, and the fact that despite his race and his Polish origin he was after naturalisation accepted on the waiting list shows, in my view, that he was not discriminated against on account of his national origins. The ground for the discrimination was that he was not a British subject. It was his nationality at the time when he applied, not his national origins, that led to the refusal to put his name on the waiting list.

a 'The first and chief mode of acquiring nationality is by birth: indeed, the acquisition of nationality by another mode is exceptional, since the vast majority of mankind acquires nationality by birth and does not change it afterwards.'⁷

This is, no doubt, true and affords a foundation for the argument that discrimination against aliens is in the vast majority of cases discrimination consequent on their national origins. It was not in this case discrimination on the ground of national origins but on the ground of the nationality possessed at the time of the making of the application to go on the waiting list. An applicant's nationality may have been acquired at birth. It may be that his nationality is due to his national origins but the council, as I understand the position, concern themselves with what an applicant is and not with what his origins were.

b While I recognise that the question for decision is a difficult one, owing to the omission in the Acts of any indication of the meaning to be given to the words 'national origins', and one on which different views may be held, it must, I think, be recognised that 'nationality' and 'national origins' have not the same meaning, and that if it had been Parliament's intention, either in 1965 or in 1968, to make discrimination between British subjects and aliens unlawful, that could easily have been achieved by the addition of the words 'or nationality' after 'national origins'. The fact that Parliament did not do so and the fact that there is no clear indication in either Act that it intended to do so and the other reasons I have stated lead me to the conclusion that the council did not act unlawfully in breach of s 5 of the 1968 Act in refusing to enter Mr Zesko's name on the waiting list.

c Of the five declarations sought by the council, four do not appear to me apposite and the fourth declaration sought requires, in my view, slight amendment so that it should be declared that by declining on or about 4th February 1969 to place Mr Zesko on their housing waiting list on account of his not then being a British subject within the meaning of the British Nationality Act 1948 the council did not commit a breach of s 5 of the Race Relations Act 1968.

d For the reasons I have given, I think that this appeal should be allowed, that a declaration in the above terms should be made, that the other declarations sought should not be granted, and that the cross-appeal should be dismissed.

f LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, three issues arise on these cross-appeals: first, has the court jurisdiction to entertain the application for a declaration by the original council? secondly, if so, should the court in the exercise of its discretion make a declaration? thirdly, if so, what should the declaration be, i.e. what is the proper construction of s 1 (1) of the Race Relations Act 1968? On the first and second issues I have had the advantage of reading the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends, Lord Donovan and Viscount Dilhorne, and I agree with what they say. I also agree with their observations on the third issue; but, since I understand that your Lordships are not unanimous on what is not an easy point of construction, I venture to make some observations of my own.

h It is the duty of a court so to interpret an Act of Parliament as to give effect to its intention. The court sometimes asks itself what the draftsman must have intended. This is reasonable enough; the draftsman knows what is the intention of the legislative initiator (nowadays almost always an organ of the executive); he knows what canons of construction the courts will apply; and he will express himself in such a way as accordingly to give effect to the legislative intention. Parliament, of course, in enacting legislation assumes responsibility for the language of the draftsman. But the reality is that only a minority of legislators will attend the debates on the legislation. Failing special interest in the subject-matter of the legislation, what will demand their attention will be something on the face of proposed legislation which alerts them to a questionable matter. Accordingly, such canons of construction as that words in a non-technical statute will primarily be interpreted according to their ordinary meaning or that a statute establishing a criminal offence will be expected to use plain and unequivocal language to delimit the ambit of the offence (i.e. that such a statute will be construed restrictively) are not only useful as part of that common code of juristic communication by which the draftsman signals legislative intention but are also constitutionally salutary in helping to ensure that legislators are not left in doubt what they are taking responsibility for. a

In some jurisdictions the courts, in order to ascertain the intention of the instrument calling for interpretation, can look at the legislative history or the 'preparatory works'. Though this may sometimes be useful, it is open to abuse and waste; an individual legislator may indicate his assent on an assumption that the legislation means so-and-so; and the courts may have no way of knowing how far his assumption is shared by his colleagues, even those present. Moreover, by extending the material of judicial scrutiny, the cost of litigation is inevitably increased. Finally, our own constitution does not know a pure legislature; the sovereign is the Queen in Parliament and the legislative history of a statute stretches back from the parliamentary proceedings—by successive drafts of a bill, heads of instruction to the draftsman, departmental papers, and minutes of executive committees—into the arcana imperii. (All this is not, of course, to say that an explanatory memorandum accompanying a complicated measure, such as accompanies almost every statutory instrument, might not often be useful both in apprising legislators of the details for which they are assuming responsibility and in assisting the courts in their task of interpretation.) b

In the absence of such material the courts have five principal avenues of approach to the ascertainment of the legislative intention: (1) examination of the social background, as specifically proved if not within common knowledge, in order to identify the social or juristic defect which is the likely subject of remedy; (2) a conspectus of the entire relevant body of the law for the same purpose; (3) particular regard to the long title of the statute to be interpreted (and, where available, the preamble), in which the general legislative objectives will be stated; (4) scrutiny of the actual words to be interpreted in the light of the established canons of interpretation; (5) examination of the other provisions of the statute in question (or of other statutes in pari materia) for the light which they throw on the particular words which are the subject of interpretation. Difficult questions can arise when these various avenues lead in different directions. Fortunately in the present case, in my view, they lead to an identical conclusion. c

First, then, the social background. There have been periods in our history which have been disgraced by acute xenophobia. Lombards, Scots, Irish (though sectarian influences were also present here), Eastern Europeans (though anti-semitism here played its part), Germans, have all at various times been objects of execration. But the 1960s were not such a period. Social strains then were caused by considerable immigration of peoples who, although often of British nationality or of citizenship of the United Kingdom and Colonies, were of alien culture and of deeper than native pigmentation, and by a recrudescence of anti-semitism. 'Wog', 'Nig-nog', 'Yid', 'Dago' were current terms of abuse. 'Chink', 'Hun', 'Russky', 'Portuguese', even 'Jerry', have a distinctly old-fashioned resonance; while 'Frog', 'Mounseer', 'Polack', 'the Potsdam Dutch and the goddam Dutch', are of purely historical significance. Uncle Tom rather than Uncle Matthew is the relevant literary stereotype. d

Secondly, for the general legal conspectus. The Race Relations Acts 1965 and 1968 do not provide a complete code against discrimination of socially divisive propaganda. The Acts do not deal at all with discrimination on the grounds of religion or political tenet. It is no offence under the Acts to stir up class hatred. It is, therefore, unquestionably with a limited sort of socially disruptive conduct that the Acts are concerned; and it is, on any reading, within a limited sphere that Parliament put its ameliorative measures into action. e a Thirdly, for the long title of the 1968 Act. This states:

‘An Act to make fresh provision with respect to discrimination on racial grounds, and to make provision with respect to relations between people of different racial origins.’

b It is significant that there is no word here about ‘nationality’, whether used in its popular or in its legal sense. Moreover, ‘racial’ is not a term of art, either legal or, I surmise, scientific. I apprehend that anthropologists would dispute how far the word ‘race’ is biologically at all relevant to the species amusingly called homo sapiens.

Fourthly, for the words of s 1(1) itself. The crucial words are:

c ‘For the purposes of this Act a person discriminates against another if on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origins he treats that other . . . less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons . . .’

d This is rubbery and elusive language—understandably when the draftsman is dealing with so unprecise a concept as ‘race’ in its popular sense and endeavouring to leave no loophole for evasion. But if discrimination on the ground of ‘nationality’ were within the intendment of the subsection, the draftsman had available a term of legal precision; it could have been used expressly in the list of grounds, leaving no room for doubt; and there would be no conceivable reason for hiding the concept obscurely within the words ‘national origins’.

e Fifthly, for the concomitant statutory provisions. The 1968 Act repealed ss 1 to 4 of the Race Relations Act 1965 (and a few other immaterial provisions of that Act); but it left the rest of the 1965 Act standing, to be cited together with it. Among the sections of the 1965 Act left standing is s 6 (1) which provides that it is a criminal offence to do certain acts ‘with intent to stir up hatred against any section of the public in Great Britain distinguished by colour, race, or ethnic or national origins’. This is the very same terminology as is used in s 1(1) of the 1968 Act, which must bear the same meaning. In other words, it is also used to define a criminal offence.

f This, I think, disposes of an argument for the original board to the following effect: ‘National origins’ must include nationality by birth, which is indeed the most usual way of acquiring nationality. A person of foreign nationality by birth can only acquire British nationality subject to residential qualifications and at the discretion of the Secretary of State. A person of foreign nationality is therefore treated less favourably than other persons (i.e. natives) if he is required to surmount the obstacles to acquiring British nationality as a condition of receiving equal treatment with natives. Thus, a foreign national who is not accorded equal treatment with the native is discriminated against on the ground of his national origins. The short answer to this line of argument is that criminal offences are not to be created in this oblique, circuitous and obscure way. The use of the words ‘national origins’ in the penal section of the 1965 Act tends to suggest a restricted rather than an expansive meaning.

g As for the other provisions of the 1968 Act itself, the very word ‘nationality’ appears in ss 8 (11) and 27 (9) (a) of the Act. Both of these provisions are by way of exception from the generality of the Act. It was argued on behalf of the original board that this shows the generality (‘national origins’) must be wide enough to include what is excepted from it (‘nationality’). But this would mean extending the ambit of the criminal offences created by s 6 of the 1965 Act not only by an implication but by an implication dependent on an argument of considerable subtlety; it is not, in my view, the right way to approach the construction of a statute involving penal provisions; on the contrary, the courts will look for unambiguous expression; and, in the event of ambiguity, will prefer the narrower construction. Moreover, I think that considerable caution is needed in construing a general statutory provision by reference to its statutory exceptions. ‘Saving clauses’ are often included by way of reassurance, for avoidance of doubt or from abundance of caution. Section 27(9)(a) itself provides a striking example: it provides that nothing in the Act should invalidate certain rules restricting certain classes of employment to 'persons of particular birth, citizenship, nationality, descent or residence'; and 'residence' at least is not conceivably within the ambit of s 1(1). Once the argument on construction of the general provision from a 'saving clause' fails, the use of the word 'nationality' elsewhere in the Act gives added significance to its omission from s 1(1). a

In my judgment, therefore, all the five relevant approaches to the construction of s 1(1) of the 1968 Act tend (some more, some less, strongly, but in cumulation decisively) to the conclusion that the subsection was not dealing with discrimination on the ground of present nationality. This, however, is a negative conclusion; and the argument is not complete without a satisfactory explanation of what Parliament could have had in mind other than nationality when enacting the words 'national origins'. In addition to the probable use of the words to forestall argument based on some alleged ambiguity in the word 'race', there are, in my view, at least two such specific situations. b

I have already indicated that these words are part of a passage of vague terminology in which the words seem to be used in a popular sense. 'Origin', in its ordinary sense, signifies a source, someone or something from which someone or something else has descended. 'Nation' and 'national', in their popular in contrast to their legal sense, are also vague terms. They do not necessarily imply statehood. For example, there were many submerged nations in the former Hapsburg empire. Scotland is not a nation in the eye of international law; but Scotsmen constitute a nation by reason of those most powerful elements in the creation of national spirit—tradition, folk memory, a sentiment of community. The Scots are a nation because of Bannockburn and Flodden, Culloiden and the pipes at Lucknow, because of Jenny Geddes and Flora Macdonald, because of frugal living and respect for learning, because of Robert Burns and Walter Scott. So, too, the English are a nation—because Norman, Angevin and Tudor monarchs forged them together, because their land is mostly sea-girt, because of the common law and of gifts for poetry and parliamentary government, because (despite the Wars of the Roses and Old Trafford and Headingley) Yorkshireman and Lancastrian feel more in common than in difference and are even prepared at a pinch to extend their sense of community to southron folk. By the Act of Union English and Scots lost their separate nationalities, but they retained their separate nationhoods; and their descendants have thereby retained their separate national origins. So, again, the Welsh are a nation—in the popular, though not in the legal, sense—by reason of Offa's Dyke, by recollection of battles long ago and pride in the present valour of their regiments, because of musical gifts and religious dissent, because of fortitude in the face of economic adversity, because of the satisfaction of all Wales that Lloyd George became an architect of the welfare state and prime minister of victory. To discriminate against Englishmen, Scots or Welsh, as such, would, in my opinion, be to discriminate against them on the ground of their 'national origins'. To have discriminated against Mr Zesko on the ground of his Polish descent would have been to have discriminated against him on the ground of his national origins. c

There is another situation which the phrase is apt to cover—namely, where a person of foreign nationality by birth has acquired British nationality or where a person of British nationality by birth is descended from someone of foreign nationality. There are those who are apt to say, 'The leopard cannot change his spots; once an Erehwonian always an Erehwonian'. To discriminate against a British subject on the grounds of his foreign nationality by birth or alien lineage would be to discriminate against him on the ground of his national origins. To have discriminated against Mr Zesko on the ground of Russian nationality by birth (if such was his case, which is not clear) would have been to have discriminated against him on the ground of his national origins. d

I would therefore allow the appeal to the extent of making the declaration proposed by my noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne, and dismiss the cross-appeal. e a LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, the facts of this case are set out in the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Donovan, which I have had the advantage of reading and I need not repeat them. I agree with him that the cross-appeal on the jurisdiction point fails and I cannot usefully add anything to what he has said on the topic. I also agree with him that the appeal should be allowed; but as your Lordships are not of one mind on the question of construction I will give my reasons for thinking that the council are right in my own words. The phrase 'national origins' appeared in the statute book for the first time in ss 1, 5 and 6 of the Race Relations Act 1965. These sections, so far as relevant to this appeal, run as follows:

c '1 (1) It shall be unlawful for any person, being the proprietor or manager of or employed for the purposes of any place of public resort to which this section applies, to practise discrimination on the ground of colour, race, or ethnic or national origins against persons seeking access to or facilities or services at that place . . .

d '5 (1) In any case where the licence or consent of the landlord or of any other person is required for the disposal to any person of premises comprised in a tenancy, that licence or consent shall be treated as unreasonably withheld if and so far as it is withheld on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origins . . .

e '6 (1) A person shall be guilty of an offence under this section if, with intent to stir up hatred against any section of the public in Great Britain distinguished by colour, race, or ethnic or national origins—(a) he publishes or distributes written matter which is threatening, abusive or insulting; or (b) he uses in any public place or at any public meeting words which are threatening, abusive or insulting, being matter or words likely to stir up hatred against that section on grounds of colour, race, or ethnic or national origins . . .'

There is no definition of 'national origins' in the Act and one must interpret the phrase as best one can. To me it suggests a connection subsisting at the time of birth between an individual and one or more groups of people who can be described as a 'nation'—whether or not they also constitute a sovereign state. The connection will normally arise because the parents or one of the parents of the individual in question are or is identified by descent with the nation in question; but it may also sometimes arise because the parents have made their home among the people in question. Suppose, for example, that a man of purely French descent marries a woman of purely German descent and that the couple have made their home in England for many years before the birth of the child in question. It could, I think, fairly be said that the child had three 'national origins'—French through his father; German through his mother, and English not because he happened to have been born here but because his parents had made their home here. Of course, in most cases a man has only a single 'national origin' which coincides with his nationality at birth in the legal sense and again in most cases his nationality remains unchanged throughout his life. But 'national origins' and 'nationality' in the legal sense are two quite different conceptions and they may well not coincide or continue to coincide. That is shown by this very case. Mr Zesko was born in 1913 when Poland—although a 'nation'—was not a sovereign state but part of the Russian Empire. So at birth his 'national origins' were Polish but his nationality was Russian. When Poland became an independent state after the first war he became a Polish citizen but now, although his 'national origins' have remained throughout Polish, he has become a citizen of the United Kingdom by naturalisation. It is not difficult to see why the legislature in enacting the Race Relations Act 1965 used this new phrase 'national origins' and not the word 'nationality' which had a well-established meaning in law. It was because 'nationality' in the strict sense was quite irrelevant to the problem with which they were faced. Most of the people against whom discrimination was being practised or hatred stirred up were in fact British subjects. The reason why the words 'ethnic or national origins' were added to the words 'racial grounds' which alone appear in the long title was, I imagine, to prevent argument over the exact meaning of the word 'race'. For example, a publican who had no objection to West Indians might refuse to serve Pakistanis. He could hardly be said to be discriminating against them on grounds of colour and it might well be argued that Pakistanis do not constitute a single 'race'. On the other hand, it could hardly be argued that they did not all have the same 'national origin'. Then did the Act make it an offence for a publican or hotelkeeper to refuse to serve a customer or receive a guest on the ground of his 'nationality' in the legal sense? Of course, in practice no publican or hotelkeeper would dream of practising discrimination simply on that ground. An hotelkeeper, for example, might have come to dislike Germans or Japanese—perhaps because of his experiences as a prisoner of war—and he might refuse to accept as a guest in his hotel someone whom he recognised by his appearance, or speech or demeanour as belonging to the obnoxious race. But it is in the highest degree unlikely that his feelings would alter in any way if the potential guest told him that he had recently been naturalised as a British subject. His reaction would probably be 'once a Hun always a Hun' or 'once a Jap always a Jap'. But in order to test the validity of the board's argument it is, I think, useful to imagine an eccentric hotelkeeper who refused to give a room to anyone who could not show that he was a British subject—who, that is to say, would refuse to receive someone who although his 'national origin' was purely British had renounced his British citizenship but was ready to receive anyone who though his 'national origin' was purely foreign was a British subject either because he happened to have been born here while his parents were visiting this country or because he had become naturalised. I cannot see how it could be said that such an hotelkeeper was practising discrimination 'on the ground of national origins'.

If one turns to the Race Relations Act 1968, one finds that the meaning given to 'discrimination' in s 1 is the same as that given in the 1965 Act and, again, there is no definition of 'national origins'. The Act of 1968 covers a much wider field than the earlier Act, and it appears to have occurred to the draftsman of it that it might be construed as applying to discrimination on ground of nationality in the legal sense save insofar as the contrary was expressed. So one finds various saving clauses on which counsel for the board naturally placed considerable reliance. But I find it impossible to hold that these saving clauses—inserted as I think ex abundanti cautela—have the effect of inserting by implication the words 'or nationality' after the words 'national origins' in s 1(1) of the 1968 Act—especially as the two Acts must be read together (see s 29 (2)) and the 1965 Act, for the reasons which I have tried to give, did not, as I see it, forbid discrimination on the ground of nationality.

The rule in question in this case was not a device to evade the race relations legislation. It was made before the 1965 Act was passed and it is not suggested that the council do not apply it honestly in accordance with its terms. As soon as Mr Zesko became naturalised he was placed on the waiting list. It may well be that in fact of those persons of foreign national origins who have resided for more than five years in the area as many have become naturalised as remain aliens. It is true that one of the effects of the rule is that a foreign national who has lived in Ealing for five years but is either unwilling to apply to be naturalised or has been refused naturalisation is in a less favourable position than persons with the same residence qualification who have always been British subjects or have become naturalised. But as I see it, the council are not discriminating against such foreign nationals 'on grounds of their national origins'. I agree with the form of declaration proposed by my noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne.

LORD KILBRANDON. My Lords, the council 'discriminated' against Mr Zesko, as that word is used in s 1 (1) of the Race Relations Act 1968, inasmuch as they treated him, in a situation to which s 5 of the Act applies, less favourably than they

a treated other persons. They refused to transfer his name from the housing register, which they keep in pursuance of s 22 of the London Government Act 1963, to the waiting list of those requiring housing in the borough, and this they did because of a rule which they have made that such transfers will only be made where the applicant is a British subject, which Mr Zesko was not. Such a transfer is an essential preliminary to the allocation of a council house. This was a discrimination, under s 5 of the Act, b by a person having power to dispose of housing accommodation; whether it was also a discrimination, under s 2, by a person concerned with the provision to the public of services of a local authority it is not necessary to discuss.

The short question in the case, which I have found to be very difficult to answer, is whether that discrimination was unlawful as having been made on the ground of Mr Zesko's 'national origins'. The council say that they discriminated on the ground of his nationality, and they say that that is not ground struck at by the Act.

c That one should be left groping for, or even speculating about, the meaning of a key phrase used in a recent Act of Parliament designed to remedy social grievances by assuring large groups of citizens of the protection of the law, and at the same time imposing criminal sanctions, is an unhappy feature of our present rules for the interpretation of statutes. The discrimination complained of has been in operation in d Ealing at least since 1965; we were told that while it is not particularly common, it is by no means unknown elsewhere. The existence of it must have been familiar to the framers of the 1968 legislation. Yet that legislation is silent on the question. It must be perfectly well known, in some quarter or other, whether Parliament intended that discrimination on the ground of nationality should be distinguished from discrimination on the ground of national origins. Yet such sources are denied to those charged with the duty of saying what the Act means. Apart from the actual words of the e statute, we are indeed permitted to consider 'what was the mischief and defect for which the common law (or existing law) did not provide'. But this is at best an unsatisfactorily subjective test, since each judge must depend on his own notion of the mischief, derived from his own private interpretation of the social and political scene, whether recent or remote. The instant case provides such an unusually apt example of a commonly voiced complaint that a repetition may be forgiven.

f The council's argument gains powerful general support from the wording, framework and limitations of the Act itself. The long title speaks only of discrimination on racial grounds, and of relations between people of different racial origins. These phrases are not particularly apt to include concepts of nationality as that word is used in international law. Turning to s 1, we see that no provision is made for the prevention of discrimination in the extremely sensitive fields of religion and politics;
 g a refusal (at least by a private landlord) to house Roman Catholics or Communists as classes would not offend against the Act, although a local authority landlord might perhaps be under other restraints. The forbidden grounds are 'colour, race, or ethnic or national origins'. These characteristics seem to have something in common: they have not been acquired, and they are not held, by people of their own choice. They are in the nature of inherited features which cannot be changed, as h religion, politics, and nationality can be changed, more or less at will, although subject, in the case of the last, to fairly strict rules laid down by the receiving state. These considerations seem to indicate a deliberate exclusion of nationality from the unlawful grounds, apart from the strong argument that so familiar a popular as also juridical concept could hardly have been omitted from the area of protection by i accident.

On the other hand, the practical consequences of excluding discrimination on the ground of nationality from the scope of national origins are striking. The phrase 'on the grounds of colour, race, or ethnic or national origins' first appeared in s 1 (now repealed) of the Race Relations Act 1965, which dealt in s 2 with discrimination against persons seeking access to places of public resort such as hotels, public houses, cinemas and public transport. If 'national origins' is not wide enough to include 'nationality'

then exclusion of persons by a notice which read, for example, 'No Poles admitted', would have been of debatable legality, according as the discrimination were interpreted as being against Polish nationals or against persons of Polish origin. 'No foreigners' would have been safer, since the word 'foreigner' properly describes a foreign national rather than a British subject of foreign origin; while, as counsel for the council conceded, a notice 'British subjects only' outside a public house would have been unexceptionable, since it would have admitted persons of foreign national origins who had become British subjects by naturalisation, and it would be of no consequence that it discriminated against others on the ground of nationality. a

While s 2 of the 1965 Act has been repealed, s 6, which deals with public order, has not; the results of the interpretation proposed by the council would, as the learned judge points out⁸, be no less capricious in the realm of the criminal law. Whereas by s 3(1) discrimination on the grounds stated against persons seeking employment is made unlawful, sub-s (2) saves the provisions of any enactment relating to the employment or qualification for employment of persons. Since such enactments refer to nationality, not national origins, it was argued that here the legislature was making a special provision for nationality, and that this demonstrated that no general provision had been made in s 1. In my opinion, however, it is equally probable that Parliament, realising that nationality was comprised in the phrase 'natural origins', was making certain that existing statutory disqualifications on the ground of nationality should not be affected by the prohibition contained in this Act. b

Similar conclusions may be drawn from the terms of s 6(2), which deals with advertisements indicating that Commonwealth citizens are required for employment overseas, and s 8(11) which excepts from the provisions of s 3 the selection of a person of a particular nationality. The question is, whether the word 'nationality' is used because it was, exceptionally, necessary to reach a class not otherwise included in s 1(1), or was it used in order to except persons from a class in which they would otherwise have been included? On the whole I prefer the latter alternative. c

Section 27 deals with, inter alia, Crown employment and in sub-s (9) is found the phrase 'persons of particular birth, citizenship, nationality, descent or residence'. It appears that in this passage it has been found necessary to include characteristics, i.e. descent and residence, which are admittedly outside the s 1 classes. Does this not show that nationality is outside them also? While feeling the force of this argument, I think it probable that the reason for the use of these words is that the subsection is saving 'rules (whether made before or after the passing of this Act)', relating to employments carefully delimited, and it seems reasonable that the subsection is designed to cater for an existing pattern of rule-making, and that no firm conclusion can be arrived at from it. d

The arguments in favour of either interpretation are finely balanced. I would not accept the view that there is some presumption here in favour of freedom from liability; the race relations code does, of course, contain some criminal sanctions, and it restricts liberty, but, on the other hand, it is conceived as a measure of social reform and relief of distress. Not much help is to be got from presumptions either for freedom or in favour of benevolent interpretation. I have come to the conclusion that on a consideration of the Acts as a whole the interpretation contended for by the board leads to a result less capricious and more consistent with reality than that proposed by the council, although, as I have said, the language used, and the limitations on the assistance permissible, do not encourage confidence in the expressing of an opinion. e

On the procedural point, I agree with your Lordships and have nothing to add. Accordingly, I would dismiss this appeal. f

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD REID, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, LORD WILBERFORCE, LORD PEARSON AND LORD DIPLOCK

26th, 27th, 28th OCTOBER, 16th DECEMBER 1971

- d* Building contract – Architect's certificate – Final certificate – Conclusiveness – Conclusive evidence 'in any proceedings arising out of this Contract' – Conclusive evidence that works 'have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract' – Action commenced by contractors against employers prior to final certificate – Counterclaim put in after final certificate – Counterclaim for consequential loss in respect of defects discovered after employers going into occupation and before issue of final certificate – Whether counterclaim barred – RIBA Standard Form of Contract (1963 Edn, July 1969 Revision), cl 30 (7).

By an agreement made in June 1966 between the contractors and the employers, the contractors undertook to build a warehouse and offices. The contract was in the standard form of the RIBA and included an arbitration clause (cl 35) which provided that any dispute arising as to the construction of the contract or as to any matter or thing arising thereunder or in connection therewith was to be referred to an arbitrator. Work on the warehouse was substantially complete by June 1967 although, with the consent of the contractors, the employers had taken possession in the previous April. Interim certificates were issued by the architect in April and July following which the employers paid sums on account, leaving a balance unpaid of £14,861. They complained that the floor of the warehouse was faulty. The contractors relaid

- g* the floor, completing the work in August. In September the contractors started proceedings to recover the £14,861 and took out a summons under RSC Ord 14. The employers put in an affidavit of defence which alleged that the flooring was still faulty and that the previous defects had resulted in a loss of profits amounting to some £13,500. In October, at the hearing of the summons, a consent order was made

- h* giving the employers leave to defend on condition that they paid a further £5,000 and the action was transferred to an official referee. The £5,000 was duly paid but it was agreed after further negotiations that the action should be left in abeyance. The alleged defects in the floor were never remedied. According to the contractors this was because the employers were so busy using the warehouse that it was never convenient to do the work. In September 1968 the contractors wrote to the architect

- j* stating in effect that there was nothing substantially wrong with the work done and claiming payment. Following further correspondence, quantity surveyors measured the work and calculated the amount payable on the whole contract as £68,393, leaving a balance, after deducting the previous certificates, of £2,360. On 23rd September 1969 the architect issued the final certificate for the balance of £2,360. Clause 30 (7) of the contract provided that 'Unless a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator shall have been given . . . by either party before the Final Certificate has been issued . . . the said certificate shall be conclusive evidence in any proceedings arising out of this Contract . . . that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract . . . ' On 26th September the employers asked the contractors to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator. The contractors pointed out that it was too late, and in October 1969 they issued a second writ for the amount due on the final certificate. The 1967 action on the interim certificate was still on the file and the employers put in a defence and counterclaim in each action claiming £13,500 loss of profits because of the defective floor. The two actions were consolidated and the official referee directed the following preliminary issue to be tried: whether in view of the terms of cl 30 (7) and the issue of the architect's final certificate the employers were 'estopped from relying on their Defence and Counterclaim'. The employers appealed from a decision of the Court of Appeal^a that their counterclaim for bad work was barred in both actions. They contended that it had been impliedly agreed between the parties to vary the contract by the exclusion of cl 30 (7), or that the contractors had waived their right to rely on it, or were estopped from relying on it. They further contended that the meaning of the words in cl 30 (7) 'the said certificate shall be conclusive evidence in any proceedings arising out of this Contract' should be understood as being limited to proceedings begun after the issue of the final certificate and that, if proceedings in a court were pending, a final certificate would not be conclusive evidence. Although in the Court of Appeal it had been accepted that in the event of a decision on the preliminary issue in favour of the contractors the litigation would be concluded in their favour, during the hearing of the appeal an entirely new argument was sought to be introduced on behalf of the employers to the effect that, although cl 30 (7) made the final certificate conclusive as to the state of affairs existing at its date, it had no effect as regards a pre-existing and vested right to damages including particularly consequential damages arising in respect of breaches of contract before its date.

Held (Lord Diplock dissenting) – The employers' appeal should be dismissed for the following reasons—

(i) the new argument advanced by the employers on appeal to the House should not be admitted; it raised a doubtful and difficult question of construction on a point of fundamental importance to building contracts; the question was one therefore which it would be undesirable to decide without any assistance from the court of first instance or the Court of Appeal and on a preliminary issue without any findings of fact to provide a firm basis for considering how the provisions of the contract should be interpreted and applied; moreover hardship would be imposed on the parties if their expectation of a decisive answer on the preliminary question had to be frustrated and further costs incurred before an effective decision could be reached (see p 124 g, p 128 f, p 131 c to f and p 137 e and f, post).

(ii) on the true construction of cl 30 (7) the words 'conclusive evidence in any proceedings arising out of this Contract' were wide enough to cover proceedings begun before as well as after the date of the final certificate; to limit the words to proceedings commenced after the date of the final certificate would involve writing a limitation into cl 30 (7) which was not there (see p 124 c, p 128 a and b, p 131 g and p 136 c, post);

(iii) cl 30 (7) did not have the effect of ousting the jurisdiction of the court; by the terms of the contract the question whether the work done and the materials used conformed to the contract requirements was to be determined by the criterion of whether they were to the satisfaction of the architect; since on these questions it was the architect's standard that was relevant, there was no objection to a clause which provided that, as regards these matters, the architect's certificate was to be a conclusive evidence; the court retained ultimate control in seeing that the architect acted properly, honestly, and in accordance with the contract, but the method of proof chosen by the parties was legitimate and, by its terms, binding (see p 124 c, p 128 c, p 131 j to p 132 a and c to e and p 136 d and f, post). Doleman & Sons v Ossett Corp [1912] 3 KB 257 distinguished;

b (iv) on the facts of the case it was impossible to find any agreement between the parties to vary the contract by the exclusion of cl 30 (7) or any waiver by the contractors of their right to rely on that sub-clause or any basis for saying that they were estopped from relying on it; although the parties had elected to proceed in the courts and had not asserted their right to have the dispute referred to arbitration, thereby waiving their right to insist on arbitration in respect of that dispute, there had been no election or representation with regard to cl 30 (7) (see p 124 c, p 128 c and d, p 132 e and f and p 135 h and j, post).

c Per Lord Diplock. The new contention raised by the employers in argument on appeal was a sound one and ought to be admitted since it raised a pure point of construction of words which formed part of a single paragraph of the clause which was the subject of the dispute and it would be intellectually baffling to attempt to construe the remainder of cl 30 (7) on the assumption that one of the most important phrases in it meant something different from what it clearly did mean. The provision in cl 30 (7) that the final certificate should be conclusive evidence 'that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract' dealt, not with the activities of the contractors, but with the state of the works at the time of the issue of the certificate as a result of the activities of the contractors. The issue of the final certificate was not to be taken as conclusive evidence that at no time previously had there been defects in the works which required remedying; it was merely conclusive evidence that any remedial measures which had been necessitated by reason of defects in the works had been executed by the time of its issue. The final certificate was irrelevant to any claims for consequential damage in respect of defects which had been found after the employers had taken possession and before the issue of the final certificate. Accordingly the employers should not be debarred from pursuing their claims for consequential loss (see p 138 b to e, p 140 h to p 141 a and f and p 143 c, d, f and g, post).

Appeal

i This was an appeal by the employers, P & M Kaye Ltd, against an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR, Fenton Atkinson and Cairns LJJ) dated 5th November 1970 and reported [1971] 1 All ER 301 allowing the appeal of the contractors, Hosier & Dickinson Ltd, from the judgment of his Honour Norman Richards QC, official referee, who, on the trial of a preliminary issue in two actions brought by the contractors for sums due to them for work carried out under a building contract, held that the employers' counterclaim for loss of profits due to defective work and materials was not barred by the terms of the contract. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest.

K F Goodfellow QC, Robert Alexander and R J Coleman for the employers.
F P Neill QC and R P Ground for the contractors.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16th December. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID. My Lords, an important matter requiring an exercise of your Lordships' discretion has arisen in the course of the argument in this appeal. The central point in the case is the proper construction of cl 30 (7) of the RIBA form of building contract. For the reasons given by your Lordships I am of opinion that all the contentions and arguments put forward for the employers in the Court of Appeal¹ and repeated here must fail. But in the course of counsel's argument a completely new construction of the clause emerged which, if correct, would be conclusive in the employers' favour. There is no hint of it in the employers' printed case. We allowed the argument to be developed and to be answered by contractors' counsel, but under reservation of the question whether in the circumstances it was right to permit the point to be taken.

It is entirely within your Lordships' discretion whether or not to allow a new point to be taken at that very late stage. I think that the first question to be considered is whether, apart from any question of costs, the contractors might suffer any prejudice or might have been in a better position to meet it if it had been taken earlier. As the question is purely one of construction I doubt whether this could be said in the present case.

But there is another at least equally formidable objection. This is a form of contract which is very widely used and any decision as to the meaning of any of its clauses must have far-reaching effects. When a point is taken at the proper time we have the advantage of having before us the considered opinion of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal¹ and of hearing well prepared arguments of counsel. If I were satisfied that there could be no valid answer to the new point I would be prepared to forego those advantages and decide the case on the new point with a suitable order for costs against the employers. I am, however, not so satisfied. This is an extremely complicated form of contract and it may well be that fuller investigation would bring out arguments which would cause me to depart from my prima facie view. I recognise that rejecting the new point may seem an injustice to the employers but on the whole circumstances of this case it would not, in my view, be proper to have further delay for farther investigation. I must therefore state my judgment that this new point should not be allowed to be taken or entertained by your Lordships.

It must follow that I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, in two conjoined actions, remitted for trial before an official referee, two preliminary issues were formulated for determination. It seems to have been accepted by the parties that if the issues were determined favourably to the contractors the litigation would be concluded. When in the Court of Appeal¹ the issues were so determined it was not suggested that there could be any result other than that judgment for the contractors should be entered. It was so entered.

An agreement was made on 24th June 1966 under which the contractors agreed to carry out building work for the employers. The agreement contained the articles a of agreement, private edition (with quantities) of the Royal Institute of British Architects. Two certificates for payment (no 6 dated 5th April 1967 and no 7 dated 6th July 1967) were issued by the architect in sums totalling £32,525. Although certain sums were paid on account, a balance of £14,861 remained unpaid. The employers said that floors had been defectively constructed and that they had suffered loss for which they had a counterclaim amounting at least to the unpaid balance.

b The contractors, on 19th September 1967, sued for that balance and asked for summary judgment. The employers on oath asserted their claims. On terms that a sum of £5,000 should be paid to the contractors (for payment to nominated subcontractors) leave to defend was given and it was ordered that the action should be transferred to an official referee. That was on 27th October 1967. The parties then agreed that it would be better to await the outcome of negotiations between the architect and the contractors before the action was referred to the official referee.

c Thereafter there was correspondence between the parties and between their advisers on various dates throughout the year 1968 and in the year 1969 as to what rectification if any of defective work was necessary and as to when any such work could or should be done and as to what remedial work had been done.

In the agreement there was an arbitration clause (cl 35 (1)) in the following terms:

d 'Provided always that in case any dispute or difference shall arise between the Employer or the Architect on his behalf and the Contractor, either during the progress or after the completion or abandonment of the Works, as to the construction of this Contract or as to any matter or thing of whatsoever nature arising thereunder or in connection therewith (including any matter or thing left by this Contract to the discretion of the Architect or the withholding by the Architect of any certificate to which the Contractor may claim to be entitled or the measurement and valuation mentioned in clause 30 (5) (a) of these Conditions or the rights and liabilities of the parties under clauses 25, 26, 32 or 33 of these conditions), then such dispute or difference shall be and is hereby referred to the arbitration and final decision of a person to be agreed between the parties, or, failing agreement within 14 days after either party has given to the other a written request to concur in the appointment of an Arbitrator, a person to be appointed on the request of either party by the President or a Vice-President for the time being of the Royal Institute of British Architects.'

Clause 30 (7) of the agreement was in the following terms:

g 'Unless a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator shall have been given under clause 35 of these Conditions by either party before the Final Certificate has been issued or by the Contractor within 14 days after such issue, the said certificate shall be conclusive evidence in any proceedings arising out of this Contract (whether by arbitration under clause 35 of these Conditions or otherwise) that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract and that any necessary effect has been given to all the terms of this Contract which require an adjustment to be made to the Contract Sum...'

j There followed certain exceptions not now relevant. It is to be noted that the provisions in the agreement relating to the issue of certificates by the architect are wholly distinct from the provision relating to the reference of disputes to an arbitrator.

On 21st August 1969 the architect issued a final certificate. It was in the sum of £2,360 6s 6d. There was additionally a balance of £9,861 still owing in respect of previous certificates. The certificate was sent to, and it was asserted that final payment was due from, a company, Transloyd Ltd. That was because of an erroneous belief that that company was to be treated as the successor of the employers. When the employers' advisers wrote to say that, although in 1968 the shares in the employer company had been sold to Transloyd (Holdings) Ltd, the employer company remained in existence the contractors' advisers wrote (on 4th September 1969) calling attention to the fact that by cl 30 (7) the final certificate was conclusive evidence that the works had been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the contract; demand was made for £12,221 6s 6d (being the total of £2,360 6s 6d and £9,861).

On 23rd September 1969 the architect issued a revised certificate which certified that final payment was due from the employers (rather than from Transloyd Ltd) but which otherwise conformed with the certificate (now accepted as having been abortive) of 21st August. The employers had not in the intervening days after their attention was called to cl 30 (7) made any suggestion in regard to an arbitration.

The employers by letter written on their behalf dated 26th September 1969 then requested the contractors to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator as to matters in dispute and pointed out that such request was made within 14 days of the issue of the certificate (in correct form) dated 23rd September. Their mention of 14 days was undoubtedly made having regard to the provisions of cl 30 (7) but the attribute possessed by a final certificate of being 'conclusive evidence' (in the terms of the sub-clause) would prima facie appear only to be lacking (a) if either party had made a written request (under cl 35) to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator before the issue of a final certificate or (b) if the contractors made such a request within 14 days after such issue. The contractors said that the final certificate was conclusive and the sum of £12,221 6s 6d was demanded. At least impliedly they declined to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator.

The next step was that the contractors issued a writ on 30th October 1969. They claimed the sum of £2,360 6s 6d and the amount certified by the final certificate and in reliance on cl 30 (6) of the agreement they claimed that that sum became a debt payable 14 days after presentation of the certificate to the employers. The position at that date was, therefore, that there was the earlier action in which the proceedings had been left in suspense, there was the final certificate issued by the architect, there was a request by the employers for arbitration and there was the issue of a further writ.

The employers did not ask the court to stay the second action. The next step was that pleadings were delivered in both actions. In each action the employers delivered (on 24th November 1969) a defence and counterclaim. In each action the claims were admitted subject to set-off based on counterclaims. Shortly stated it was alleged that in breach of express and implied terms of the contract the work had been badly done with the result that there had been direct and consequential financial loss and that further remedial work would be necessary and further loss would be incurred.

Then in each action there was served (on 16th January 1970) a reply and defence to counterclaim. Clause 30 (7) was pleaded as was the issue of the final certificate and the fact that the employers had not made any written request under cl 30 (7) and it was pleaded that if there were any defects in the work (which was denied) the employers were 'estopped from relying on the same'. In each action there was an application for an order for the trial of a preliminary issue. All that was then ordered was that the actions should be transferred to an official referee. The official referee later made an order for the trial of preliminary issues and the two actions were consolidated. The preliminary issues were whether, on what the contractors had pleaded, the employers were 'estopped from relying' on their defences and counterclaims.

The employers were allowed to deliver a rejoinder. Its content serves to illustrate the fact that what the parties regarded as the contest was whether cl 30 (7) operated at all. The employers in their rejoinder pleaded (a) that cl 30 (7) was to be excluded because the parties had agreed to vary their contract by excluding cl 30 (7) a and (b) that the contractors had waived their right to rely on it and (c) that the contractors were estopped from relying on it. The whole focus of the case was on the question whether the employers could in some way eliminate cl 30 (7) and the case proceeded, as it appears to me, on the basis that if they could not, then the litigation was concluded in the contractors' favour.

b That this was so is amply evidenced by the judgment of the learned official referee. It shows that what was being considered was the meaning of the words (in their context in cl 30 (7)) 'in any proceedings arising out of this contract'. The employers argued that those words should be understood as being limited to proceedings begun after the issue of a final certificate. So they contended that if proceedings in a court were pending a final certificate would not be conclusive evidence. The learned official referee was persuaded by the contention, and the operative sentence of his judgment is as follows:

c "The words "conclusive evidence in any proceedings" must in my judgment be construed as referring to proceedings initiated after the final certificate and which raise matters of dispute which do not already form part of the matters in dispute in current legal proceedings issued before the final certificate.'

d That view involved reading in some words to cl 30 (7).

It is to be observed that the agreement to refer disputes or differences to arbitration is in wide terms. It relates to disputes either during the progress of the works or after their completion. Furthermore the agreement is in very definite terms. Disputes 'shall' be referred to arbitration. If, however, one party commenced litigation in the courts it would be for the court in the exercise of its discretion to decide whether or not to order a stay (see the judgment of Fletcher Moulton LJ in Doleman & Sons v Ossett Corpⁿ2). Clause 30 (7) does not in any way limit or restrict cl 35. It deals with the question of the conclusiveness of a final certificate as evidence.

e As by the terms of the agreement it was provided that disputes were to be referred to arbitration it was natural that cl 30 (7) should deal with the situation where an arbitration was in train. A final certificate was then not to be conclusive evidence in the terms set out in cl 30 (7). So if there was a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator before a final certificate had been issued such final certificate would not be conclusive evidence. The contractors agree that the same result would follow if arbitration proceedings (though agreed on orally) were actually in progress or had been agreed on. In practice if arbitration proceedings were in progress or were pending there would almost certainly have been some previous written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator.

g But what is the position if there has been no reference to arbitration and no initiation of such a reference by the giving of a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator? In that event unless some words are to be written into cl 30 (7) the position would be that a final certificate would be conclusive evidence (in the terms of cl 30 (7)) in any proceedings whether they be arbitration proceedings 'or otherwise'. The words 'or otherwise' must denote court proceedings. The only exception to this would be that the contractor (but only he) could deny to a final certificate the attribute of being conclusive evidence by writing within 14 days to request arbitration.

h It was powerfully argued that it is strange that if arbitration proceedings have been begun a later final certificate will not have the attribute of being conclusive evidence in the terms of cl 30 (7) whereas if court proceedings have been begun (which the court might have stayed in favour of arbitration proceedings) a later final certificate will have the attribute referred to. Hence it was argued that to the words 'conclusive evidence in any proceedings' (in cl 30 (7)) there should be read in such words as 'begun after such certificate has become conclusive'. While it is to be noted that the contractors accept that a minor process of reading in words to cl 30 (7) may be necessary to cover the possible though perhaps unlikely case of arbitration proceedings having been begun after an oral agreement and without any actual 'written' request, I have come to the conclusion, in agreement with the Court of Appeal³, that the contention of the employers cannot be upheld. It would involve a considerable alteration on what was agreed. It would involve adding an exception to 'any proceedings' which went quite beyond what the parties provided for. It is understandable that as the parties had contracted to refer disputes to arbitration they would not give to a final certificate issued while arbitration proceedings were proceeding or pending the attribute of being 'conclusive evidence'. But they have not agreed that a final certificate issued while court proceedings are pending should not have the attribute. Nor do I see any reason why the parties should not have agreed as to the conclusiveness as a matter of evidence in any proceedings of some particular document. No ouster of the jurisdiction of the court is thereby involved.

The further contentions of the employers cannot, in my view, be upheld. I see no ground at all for the suggestion that the parties agreed to vary their contract by excluding cl 30 (7). Nor, on my view, is there warrant for saying that the contractors waived their right to rely on cl 30 (7) or that the employers refrained from claiming arbitration proceedings because they were induced to believe that the contractors did not rely on cl 30 (7). As Cairns LJ pointed out⁴, the contractors had no need to rely on cl 30 (7) when they commenced proceedings in 1967. There was no occasion for them to refer to or rely on cl 30 (7) unless and until the architect issued a final certificate.

I think, therefore, that the Court of Appeal³ came to a correct conclusion. It must be added, however, that as the arguments developed there emerged one that was entirely new and alternative. It was to the effect that if, contrary to the arguments presented, the final certificate was conclusive evidence it was only conclusive evidence in the terms of the words of cl 30 (7) and that those words ought not to be construed as excluding or defeating the claims in respect of defective work and, more particularly, the claims for consequential loss covered by the pleadings of the employers. This argument was one that would enlarge and wholly transform the area of the contentions so that they would extend far beyond those which the learned official referee and the Court of Appeal³ were invited to consider. The argument if fully developed would raise matters of consequence involving a detailed consideration of the agreement as a whole. If the points raised are to be pronounced on that should be in some case where they have been fully ventilated and where they have been examined in the judgments under appeal.

For the reasons which I have given I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, the relevant clauses in the building contract dated 24th June 1966 between the appellants (as 'employers') and the respondents (as 'contractors') are the following (the form used was the RIBA private edn, 1963, with quantities):

'30... (7)—Unless a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator shall have been given under Clause 35 of these Conditions by either party before the Final Certificate has been issued or by the Contractor within 14 days after such issue, the said certificate shall be conclusive evidence in any proceedings arising out of this Contract (whether by arbitration under Clause 35 of these Conditions or otherwise) that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract and that any necessary effect has been given to all the terms of this Contract which require an adjustment to be made to the Contract sum... [here follow certain exceptions].

a '35. (1)—Provided always that in case any dispute or difference shall arise between the Employer or the Architect on his behalf and the Contractor, either during the progress or after the completion or abandonment of the Works, as to the construction of this Contract or as to any matter or thing of whatsoever nature arising thereunder or in connection therewith (including any matter or thing left by this Contract to the discretion of the Architect or the withholding by the Architect of any certificate to which the Contractor may claim to be entitled or the measurement and valuation mentioned in Clause 30 (5) (a) of these Conditions or the rights and liabilities of the parties under Clauses 25, 26, 32 or 33 of these Conditions), then such dispute or difference shall be and is hereby referred to the arbitration and final decision of a person to be agreed between the parties or, failing agreement within 14 days after either party has given to the other a written request to concur in the appointment of an Arbitrator, a person to be appointed on the request of either party by the President or a Vice-President for the time being of the Royal Institute of British Architects.'

If the present dispute is to be understood it is necessary to relate these clauses to the history of events and (I fear in some detail) to the pleadings in the consolidated action.

d The contract was for the erection of a warehouse and offices. The contract sum was £45,660, increased by extras etc to £60,393. The dates for possession and completion were 'to be agreed' and the contract contained a clause providing for liquidated and ascertained damages at the rate of £100 per week. Work on the warehouse was substantially completed by June 1967; interim certificates were issued by the architect, in particular no 6 on 5th April 1967, and no 7 on 6th July 1967, for sums totalling £32,525. The employers paid about £17,000 on account, leaving a balance unpaid of £14,861. They complained that the floor of the warehouse was faulty, and the contractors relaid it, completing this work by 8th August 1967.

e On 19th September 1967 the contractors issued a writ and statement of claim for £14,861 and took out a summons under RSC Ord 14. The employers put in an affidavit seeking leave to defend in which they claimed (i) that the warehouse floor was still faulty and (ii) that the previous defects had resulted in a loss of profit amounting to £13,464.

f On the hearing of the Ord 14 summons on 27th October 1967 an order was made by consent that the employers should have leave to defend on payment to the contractors of £5,000 before 11th December 1967. The action was then to be transferred to the official referee. It appears that the £5,000 was paid but the action was left in abeyance; correspondence was exchanged about the alleged defects, the contractors offering to do certain work, but the employers continuing to use the warehouse and not finding it convenient to have further work done. On 11th September 1968 the contractors wrote to the architect a letter which contained the following passage:

g 'Finally, we would add that despite the cracking in certain areas of the granolithic floor the surface shows no signs whatsoever of deterioration despite the obvious heavy use it is receiving. It is our considered opinion that further work to the floor is completely unnecessary due to the foregoing and should be no reason for the [employers] to withhold payment of such vast sum of money which they are now so doing.'

h In other words, they were contending that there was nothing substantially wrong with the work done or the materials used, and claiming their money. Correspondence continued; the quantity surveyors measured the work at a total figure of £68,393 and, on 6th August 1969, the contractors wrote to the architect requesting him to issue the final certificate. This he did on 25th August 1969 for £68,393, less previous certificates £66,033, making a balance of £2,360 due on the final certificate.

Some difficulty arose because of changes in the control of his employers and finally a revised final certificate was issued on 23rd September 1969 for the same sum. a

On 26th September 1969 the employers asked the contractors to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator, but, as reference to cl 35 of the contract, already quoted, will show, this request was too late; it could only be validly made by the employers before the final certificate. On 30th October 1969 the contractors issued a second writ claiming £2,360. In November 1969 the employers delivered a defence and counterclaim in both actions. They pleaded two express terms of the contract (cll 1 (1) and 6 (1)) relating to the carrying out and completion of the works and to the materials, goods and workmanship to be used and two implied terms as to quality and fitness. They alleged breaches of these terms leading to shrinkage and cracks in the warehouse floor! They gave particulars of special damage, including loss of profit, amounting to £13,464 and claimed that there was further remedial work to be done. b

On 16th January 1970 the contractors delivered a reply and defence to counterclaim in each action. This referred to cl 30 (7) of the contract (above), to the issue of the final certificates and to the absence of any reference to arbitration. It continued that by reason of these matters 'if there were any defects as alleged or at all, which is denied, the [employers] are estopped from relying on the same'. The actions were then consolidated and transferred to the official referee. By his leave, on 1st May 1970, the employers delivered a rejoinder. By this they alleged that the parties— d

'agreed to vary the said contract by the exclusion therefrom of cl 30 (7) and/or [the contractors] waived their right to rely upon and/or are estopped from relying upon the said cl 30 (7).'

Particulars under eight headings were given of the alleged agreement, waiver and estoppel. In the alternative it was said that, by reason of the matters pleaded, cl 30 (7) could not be relied on in the first action.

It has been necessary to go into these procedural details in order to understand the nature of the issue now for decision. The preliminary issue, directed by the official referee to be tried, is expressed as follows: f

'Whether upon the facts pleaded [in specified paragraphs] the [employers] are estopped from relying on their Defence and Counterclaim.'

From the pleadings as summarised above it is clear that, on the one hand the contractors were saying that the final certificate(s) were final and conclusive, and that, on the other hand, the employers were contending that they did not have this effect because cl 30 (7) of the contract was made ineffective by agreement, or waiver, or estoppel. These were the issues debated before the official referee, on which he decided in the employers' favour. The essential ground of his judgment was that once the parties had taken proceedings in the courts, such proceedings must prevail, and that cl 30 (7), in particular the words 'conclusive evidence in any proceedings', did not apply to proceedings initiated before the final certificate. g

On appeal to the Court of Appeal⁵ the same issue was argued, and decided this time in favour of the contractors. The words 'in any proceedings' should be given their general unlimited sense. The court also dealt with the pleas of implied agreement, waiver and estoppel. In the employers' printed case before this House signed by very experienced counsel these same issues were raised, and set out in some detail. The two questions stated as arising for decision are (1) whether cl 30 (7) applied to court proceedings begun before the issue of the final certificate, (2) whether, if so, the contractors are entitled to rely on the final certificate as conclusive. The reasons suggested for a negative answer are that the contractors have waived their rights or because the parties had by conduct varied the agreement. i a In the argument at the Bar, counsel for the employers sought to introduce an entirely fresh argument. This was that, as a matter of construction, cl 30 (7) only made the final certificate conclusive as to the state of affairs existing at its date, and had no effect as to other matters arising during the currency of the contract. Its effect was, at most, to establish conclusively that as at its date the works had been properly carried out; it had no effect as regards a pre-existing and vested right to damages including, particularly, consequential damages arising as regards breaches of contract before its date.

b My Lords, I am always reluctant to exclude a relevant argument with some apparent substance, particularly one of law, however late this argument may appear. It is never attractive or satisfactory to deny a party the right to put a legal submission; failure to do so previously can normally be sanctioned by an order as to costs. But I have come to the conclusion that this new argument ought not now to be admitted.

c It raises a fundamental point as to the nature of building contracts, and the parties' rights under them, which goes far beyond this particular dispute and this particular clause. No hint of it appears in the pleadings, or correspondence, or the printed cases, or, so far as I know, in any textbook. A decision on it will have far-reaching effects on the many contracts made on this form, and may involve the interpretation, certainly the consideration, of numerous clauses in this complicated document, particularly those relating to practical completion, sectional completion, defects liability, liquidated damages. It raises the question whether, under a contract such as this, consequential damages can be claimed, whether this normally existing right is replaced by other remedies, and whether after final certificate, and subject to any right to arbitrate, all claims are excluded. It will involve consideration, at least, of certain observations made in this House in *Westminster City Council v J Jarvis & Sons Ltd*⁶. Your Lordships would have to decide these questions without the assistance of any consideration by the official referee, or by the Court of Appeal⁷. The present case, in my opinion, is one in which the strict course ought to be adopted of deciding a specific question on the specific issues selected by the parties as decisive one way or the other of the actions: these are the issues I have already set out. I say nothing as to the merits or otherwise of the fresh point, except that on such discussion as we have heard there are evidently arguments either way. We should not pronounce on them here.

f Of the issues which are open for decision, the most difficult, in my opinion, is whether the words 'conclusive evidence in any proceedings arising out of this Contract' should be limited to proceedings commenced after the date of the final certificate or whether they also cover proceedings previously begun. As a matter of language it can hardly be doubted which alternative is to be preferred: to accept the former involves writing in a limitation which is not there. But there are more substantial issues involved, which relate, broadly, to the interaction between an architect's certificate and the power and duty of the courts to decide disputes. Can the parties, it may be asked, by a contractual stipulation, exclude the courts from their constitutional responsibility? If one considers the closely analogous field of arbitration, one may contrast the willingness of the courts to stay court proceedings when there has been a submission to arbitration, while still retaining ultimate control, with their unwillingness, once court proceedings have started, to allow the question before the court to be decided by subsequent arbitration—see *Doleman & Sons v Ossett Corp*⁸, not cited before the Court of Appeal⁷ but referred to by Cairns LJ in his judgment⁹. The present case resembles, it is said, the situation in that case.

j My Lords, I am impressed, as was Lord Denning MR¹⁰, with this argument, but on the whole I have come to a conclusion against it. To describe cl 30 (7), as sought to be invoked here, as an ouster of the court's jurisdiction, seems to me to beg the question and in fact to misdescribe the effect attributed to it. The court proceedings, as can be seen from the pleadings, raise the question whether the work done and the materials used were such as should have been done and used under the contract. An essential question must be, what standard is to be set? If the proper standard to which that work and those materials ought to conform were one to be fixed by the court (for example, by reference to what is reasonable), I could see good reasons for not allowing this matter to be decided conclusively outside the court by another person. But that is not what the contract provides. Throughout the contract, the architect is the person to pronounce on these matters. This appears right from the inception: in cl 1 (1) where it is said that the works are to be carried out and completed (it may be noted that this language is repeated in cl 30 (7)) to the reasonable satisfaction of the architect; and as regards materials it is for the architect to be satisfied that they are in accordance with the contract bills. This being so, what objection can there be to a clause which provides that, as regards these matters, as to which it is the architect's standard that is relevant, the architect's final certificate is to be conclusive evidence? The court has to find the facts. It has to do so in accordance with the contract. The clause provides a means—the means—of establishing the facts. The court retains ultimate control in seeing that the architect acts properly and honestly and in accordance with the contract. The method of proof, chosen by the parties, is legitimate, and by its terms binding, and I can see no reason for denying the contractual effect of the evidence to proceedings previously commenced, or, as I would prefer to put it, for reading in a limitation to subsequent proceedings. Allowing to *Doleman & Sons v Ossett Corpn*¹¹ its full force (and I note that four very eminent judges were equally divided even there) the present case is altogether different.

7 [1971] 1 All ER 301, [1970] 1 WLR 1611

There remain the arguments as to implied agreement, waiver and estoppel. The employers, in my opinion, failed to make good their arguments. I am content to accept the reasons for this given by Cairns LJ in the Court of Appeal¹². Had the matter gone to arbitration the position would no doubt have been different; this is because cl 35 of the contract confers very wide powers on arbitrators to open up and review certificates which a court would not have. But they did not go to arbitration and giving full recognition to the fact that, initially, this may have been by consent, I see no reason for implying from that consent a variation, or exclusion, of cl 30 (7) insofar as it made the final certificate(s) conclusive.

I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD PEARSON. My Lords, ultimately the crucial question in this appeal is whether a point of construction, which emerged for the first time in the course of the argument on this appeal, should be entertained and decided or not. An exercise of discretion is involved. Therefore it is, in my opinion, necessary to consider both the general scheme of the contract relating to the making good of defects and the history of the case so far as it can be gathered from the available documents.

The appellants, who will be referred to as 'the employers', and the respondents, who will be referred to as 'the contractors', were the parties to a contract dated 24th June 1966 for the building of a warehouse and offices. The contract by cl 15 provided that when in the opinion of the architect the works were practically completed, he should issue a certificate to that effect, and then the defects liability period, being a six months' period, would begin. Making good of defects appearing in the defects liability period could be required by the architect (i) by delivery of a schedule of defects to the contractors, not later than 14 days after the expiration of the defects liability period, (ii) by separate instructions, provided that such instructions should a not be issued after delivery of a schedule of defects or after 14 days from the expiration of the defects liability period. The contractors were obliged to make good the defects within a reasonable time after their receipt of the schedule of defects or the instructions. When in the opinion of the architect any defects required to be made good had been made good, he would issue a certificate to that effect. Clause 16 provided that if at any time before practical completion of the works the employers

b with the consent of the contractors took possession of a part of the works, practical completion of that part should be deemed to have occurred, and the defects liability period in respect of that part should be deemed to have commenced on the date when possession was taken. Clause 22 provided for liquidated damages for delay in completing the works, and cl 23 and 33 provided for extension of time in certain events. Clause 30 provided for interim certificates and interim payments subject to retention of a portion of the sums certified, and for one moiety of the sums retained
c to be paid after issue of the certificate of practical completion and for the other moiety to be paid on the expiration of the defects liability period or on the issue of the certificate of making good defects, whichever should be the later. Certain documents were to be sent by the contractors to the architect for the purposes of his measurement and valuation of the works. Clause 30 (6) provided:

d 'So soon as is practicable but before the expiration of 3 months from the end of the Defects Liability Period . . . or from completion of making good defects under clause 15 . . . or from receipt by the Architect of the documents . . . whichever is the latest, the Architect shall issue the Final Certificate.'

The final certificate was to show (a) the sum of the amounts paid to the contractors
e under interim certificates and the amount of the retention money (presumably also by this time paid to the contractors) and (b) the contract sum adjusted in accordance with the conditions of the contract, and the resulting debt owing by the employers to the contractors or by the contractors to the employers. Clause 30 (7) provided:

f 'Unless a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator shall have been given under clause 35 of these conditions by either party before the Final Certificate has been issued or by the Contractors within 14 days after such issue, the said certificate shall be conclusive evidence in any proceedings arising out of this Contract (whether by arbitration under clause 35 of these Conditions or otherwise) that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract and that any necessary effect has
g been given to all the terms of this Contract which require an adjustment to be made to the Contract Sum . . . '

There were certain exceptions not material to this case. Clause 30 (8) provided:

h 'Save as aforesaid no certificate of the Architect shall of itself be conclusive evidence that any works materials or goods to which it relates are in accordance with this Contract.'

Clause 35 provided that any dispute or difference arising under or in connection with the contract should be referred to the arbitration and final decision of a person to be agreed between the parties, or failing agreement within 14 days after either party had given to the others a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator, a person to be appointed on the request of either party by the president or vice-j president for the time being of the Royal Institute of British Architects.

The work under the contract was carried out by the contractors and their sub-contractors. Although the specified date for completion was a date in September 1967, the employers with the consent of the contractors took possession of the warehouse on 10th April 1967. Consequently under cl 16 of the contract practical completion of the warehouse was deemed to have occurred and the defects liability period in respect of the warehouse was deemed to have commenced on 10th April 1967. On 25th April 1967 the architect wrote to the contractors stating that the flooring in the warehouse was defective and would have to be taken up and replaced. The contractors started the relaying of the floor on 1st June and finished it by 8th August 1967. That was a making good of defects in the defects liability period and in pursuance of a requirement from the architect. On 31st August 1967 the employers wrote to the architect, informing him that the relaid floor was cracking and asking for action to be taken. On 15th September 1967 the architect wrote to the contractors, saying that the left hand side of the warehouse floor was in a condition which required its removal and replacement but adding:

'In view of the serious implications involved in the taking-up and re-laying of the floor, as regards a further claim from the client not being able to use the premises, I think that it would be prudent for all parties to meet, together with their respective solicitors, before any remedial works are put in hand.'

That letter from the architect was written within the defects liability period and it notified a serious defect but it was not requiring any work of making good to be done.

On 19th September 1967 the contractors commenced an action against the employers, claiming a balance of £14,861 still owing under interim certificates. On 3rd October 1967 the contractors took out a summons asking for summary judgment under RSC Ord 14, and filed an affidavit in support of the summons. The employers filed affidavits in opposition to the summons, saying in effect that by reason of the defective floor and the past relaying of it and the expected second relaying of it they had been and would be deprived of the use of the warehouse or parts of it with consequent loss of profit and had incurred expense in removal of goods and transportation costs. They said that they had a counterclaim of greater amount than the contractors' claim and they relied on the counterclaim as a set-off. On the hearing of the summons for judgment the master made an order by consent of the parties that on payment of £5,000 to the contractors' solicitors the employers should have leave to defend as to the whole of the contractors' claim and that the action be transferred to one of the official referees. Later it was agreed between the parties' solicitors that transfer to the official referee should be deferred.

The correspondence, which has been referred to in this appeal, shows that the contractors and their relevant sub-contractors were willing to do further remedial work, but they were complaining of being prevented from doing such work—in the first place by lack of specific instructions from the architect and afterwards for a long period because the employers who were using the warehouse could not or would not afford an opportunity for the remedial work on the floor to be carried out. In a letter of 13th February 1968, the contractors sent to the architect a letter from the relevant sub-contractors in which the writer stated:

'I have myself inspected the floor on Thursday last, and found that heavy lorries were using this floor. It seems to me that it would be inconvenient for Mr. Kaye to release any part of the floor for remedial work to be carried out. As we all know there are quite a lot of cracks in this Granolithic floor area, but the surface is still in tack and very hard, which we would quite confidently guarantee for the next ten years. With my experience in the past I have seen cracking of a similar nature, but no further defects to the surface have occurred. This is why we are prepared to give a covenant on this floor if it is inconvenient for us to carry out this remedial work.'

Months later, on 11th September 1968, the contractors wrote to the architect complaining of not being allowed promised access to the warehouse for remedial work, and stating:

'Finally, we would add that despite the cracking in certain areas of the granolithic floor the surface shows no signs whatever of deterioration despite the

a obvious heavy use it is receiving. It is our considered opinion that further work to the floor is completely unnecessary due to the foregoing and should be no reason for the [employers] to withhold payment of such vast sum of money which they are now so doing.'

Nearly a year later, on 21st August 1969, no remedial work having been done, there was issued by the architect what may be called an abortive final certificate wrongly b addressed to a company which had taken over the employers by buying most of their shares. There were new solicitors acting for the employers. They objected to the issue of the certificate. Their attention was drawn to cl 30 (7) of the contract in a letter from the contractors' solicitors dated 4th September 1969. On 23rd September 1969 a revised final certificate was issued by the architect, and it was duly addressed to the employers. In a letter of 26th September 1969 the employers' new solicitors
c purported to request the contractors to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator, and they pointed out that this request was made within 14 days of the issue of the certificate. Evidently they had misread cl 30 (7), which enables only the contractors to make the request after the date of the certificate.

On 30th October 1969 the contractors commenced a second action against the employers claiming £2,360 6s 6d being the amount due under the final certificate.
d On 24th November 1969 the employers served their defences and counterclaims in substantially the same terms in the two actions. As in their affidavits in the RSC Ord 14 proceedings, to which reference has been made, they counterclaimed what may be called consequential damages resulting from the defects in the warehouse floor and they relied on this counterclaim as a set-off against the contractors' claims in the two actions. On 16th January 1970 the contractors served in each action a reply
e and defence to counterclaim, and in addition to joinder of issue they pleaded that by reason of cl 30 (7) and the final certificate 'if there were defects as alleged, or at all, which is denied, the [employers] are estopped from relying on the same'. After certain interlocutory proceedings, the official referee on 15th April 1970 ordered that the two actions be consolidated and that the following question be tried as a preliminary issue, namely:

f 'Whether upon the facts pleaded in Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the [contractors'] reply and defence . . . the [employers] are estopped from relying on their Defence and Counterclaim.'

The employers were given leave to serve a rejoinder. In their rejoinder they pleaded g that the contractors and the employers had agreed to vary the contract by the exclusion therefrom of cl 30 (7), and/or the contractors had waived their right to rely on and/or were estopped from relying on cl 30 (7). Particulars were given.

Dealing first and shortly with the matters raised in the rejoinder, I do not think it is possible to find anywhere in the history of this case any agreement between the parties to vary the contract by the exclusion of cl 30 (7) or any waiver by the contractors of their right to rely on that sub-clause or any basis for saying that they are
h estopped from relying on it. It is true that both parties elected to proceed in the courts and did not assert their right to have the dispute referred to arbitration. Thereby they waived their right to insist on arbitration in respect of that dispute. But there was no election or representation with regard to cl 30 (7). The principal argument for the employers on this part of the case was that when the dispute had
j been submitted to the courts it was no longer possible for either party to serve a notice requesting arbitration as contemplated by the sub-cl (7), and therefore sub-cl (7) could not be operated as intended and must be taken to have been impliedly excluded or waived. But the subclause could still be operated: the notice could be served, even though it might not in fact lead to arbitration. The evident intention of the first part of the sub-clause was to provide a procedure whereby a subsisting dispute would not hold up indefinitely the issue of a final certificate. There would be a request for arbitration, and then the final certificate could issue and establish the amount of the debt but not afford conclusive evidence of the matters referred to in the subclause. That is what would have happened if the employers had made their request for arbitration on (say) 22nd September 1969, before the final certificate, instead of on 26th September 1969, after the final certificate.

Next, there is a point of construction on which the official referee decided the preliminary question in favour of the employers. He said:

‘The words “conclusive evidence in any proceedings” must in my judgment be construed as referring to proceedings initiated after the final certificate and which raise matters of dispute which do not already form part of the matters in dispute in current legal proceedings issued before the final certificate.’

This construction has some attractions as giving a reasonable meaning to the subclause, but I must agree with Lord Denning MR¹³ in rejecting it on the ground that the words ‘any proceedings’ are so all-embracing that they should not be limited in the way suggested.

Next, there is the argument, based on the case of *Doleman & Sons v Ossett Corpn*¹⁴, that when once the court is seised of a dispute, the jurisdiction of the court to decide that dispute cannot be ousted by an arbitral decision of some other body or person. But I think the present case is distinguishable. The architect’s function is not primarily or essentially an arbitral function. The works have to be carried out to his satisfaction, and accordingly he must give or withhold his expression of satisfaction. He may notify defects and require them to be made good. He has to issue certificates showing how much money is owing. Incidentally his certificates and instructions may resolve some controversial points, and he has to act fairly, but he is not primarily or characteristically adjudicating on disputes. If in a contract such as this the parties agree that the architect’s final certificate shall be conclusive evidence of certain matters, I do not think there is any invasion of the court’s jurisdiction or any affront to its dignity. The court’s function in a civil case is to adjudicate between the parties, and if they have agreed that a certain certificate shall be conclusive evidence the court can admit the evidence and treat it as conclusive.

There remains for consideration the question of construction, which had not been raised at any earlier stage of these proceedings but was suggested to the employers’ counsel when he was opening this appeal. In the wording of cl 30 (7), ‘the said certificate shall be conclusive evidence . . . that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract’, there is an ambiguity. What I will call ‘meaning no 1’ is that the whole series of building operations from beginning to end must be deemed to have been duly carried out and completed, so that any claim in respect of alleged past defects and their consequences is excluded. What I will call ‘meaning no 2’ is that everything that had to be done by way of building operations has now been done and properly done, all defects having been made good, so that the present state of the building is satisfactory but there is no exclusion of claims in respect of alleged past defects and their consequences. In all the earlier stages of these proceedings it was assumed that meaning no 1 was correct. The order for the preliminary question to be tried was made on the understanding that a decision of that question in favour of the contractors would eliminate the employers’ counterclaim and set-off and so enable the contractors to recover the balances which have been outstanding for several years. Counsel have agreed that that was the understanding. The same understanding was implied in the arguments presented to the Court of Appeal¹⁵ and in the judgment of the Court of Appeal¹⁵ and in the printed cases of the parties in this appeal.

a There are certain points in favour of meaning no 1. First, the certificate is conclusive evidence not only that the works have been properly completed but also that they have been properly carried out, and therefore the certificate might not unreasonably be regarded as conveying approval and absolution not only in respect of the final result but also in respect of the series of operations leading up to the final result. Secondly, there has usually already been, at least three months before the final certificate, a certificate of completion of making good defects, and that is, or would ordinarily be, an expression of satisfaction with the present state of the building. What, then, is added in this respect by the final certificate? Perhaps it is only the substitution of conclusive evidence for prima facie evidence, but more probably it has a wider effect of putting an end to disputes about the building operations. Thirdly, there is, I think, an expression of opinion in favour of meaning no 1 in *Westminster City Council v J Jarvis & Sons Ltd*¹⁶, although it was not an essential part of the reasoning. My noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, said of the employers' construction in that case¹⁷:

d 'It fits in reasonably well with those provisions in the contract which distinguish between such completion as enables the contract to proceed, and such final and verified completion as enables certificates to be given, final payment to be made and the party cleared of all obligations under the contract.'

On the other hand, there is much to be said in favour of meaning no 2, especially as it avoids a fictitious certification of all things having been properly done in the past when in fact some things were defectively done.

e But, in my opinion, the choice between meaning no 1 and meaning no 2 involves a doubtful and difficult question of construction, which it would be undesirable for your Lordships to decide without any assistance from the court of first instance or the Court of Appeal and on a preliminary issue without any findings of fact to provide a firm basis for considering how the provisions of the contract should be interpreted and applied. Moreover, hardship would be imposed on the parties if their expectation of a decisive answer on the preliminary question had to be frustrated and further costs had to be incurred before an effective decision could be reached. In my opinion, this question of construction should not be entertained in this appeal, but should be kept open for decision in some future case if it should arise.

f I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD DIPLOCK. My Lords, the relevant facts have been fully stated in the speeches of Lord Wilberforce and Lord Pearson. I need not repeat them, save to draw attention to the fact that during the defects liability period in respect of the warehouse the architect found it necessary to issue to the contractor instructions to make good faults due to materials or workmanship not in accordance with the contract.

h It is unfortunate that when cl 30 (7) was under consideration before the official referee and in the Court of Appeal¹⁸ attention was focused on the words 'in any proceedings arising out of this Contract (whether by arbitration under clause 35 of these Conditions or otherwise)'. It was assumed without any argument that if these words included an action brought before the date of issue of the final certificate, the certificate would dispose of the employers' defence and counterclaim in the two actions brought against them by the contractors, one in 1967 for money due under two interim certificates and the other in 1969 for money due under the final certificate itself.

j The correctness of this assumption depends on the meaning to be attached to the words in cl 30 (7) which define the facts of which the final certificate is to be conclusive evidence. They are: 'that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this contract'. It was only in the course of the argument before your Lordships' House that the contention was first raised that these words referred only to the state of the works at the date of the certificate and that they did not amount to a statement, known in the instant case to be false in fact, that at no time during the construction of the works or during the defects liability period defective work had been done by the contractor in breach of contract, which had caused consequential damage to the employer before the defects were made good.

For reasons which I will state briefly hereafter, I think that this contention is a sound one. Your Lordships no doubt have a discretion to refuse to entertain it because of the late stage at which it was raised. It does not even figure in the employers' case in this House. I understand the disinclination that the majority of your Lordships feel to decide it in the instant appeal unaided by any expression of opinion on it by the official referee or by the Court of Appeal¹⁹. But it is the pure point of construction of words which form part of a single paragraph of one clause contained in a well-known and widely used form of contract. The paragraph must be construed as a whole in the context of the remaining paragraphs of cl 30 and in the light of the business purpose intended to be achieved by it as ascertained from a consideration of the provisions of the contract as a whole. I should find it intellectually baffling to attempt to construe the remainder of cl 30 (7) on the assumption that one of the most important phrases in it meant something different from what I am satisfied it does mean. For the remaining words of the paragraph would have to be treated as appearing in a different context from that in which, in my opinion, they do appear. Their meaning might be affected by the precise meaning which I should have to assume to be ascribed to the actual words of the phrase in question. Moreover, the application of the common law principle laid down in *Doleman & Sons v Ossett Corpn*²⁰ as to ouster of the jurisdiction of the courts, whether as an aid to construction of the clause itself or as avoiding the conclusiveness of the final certificate in pending litigation would, in my view, depend on the precise extent of the matters as to which the final certificate was to be conclusive. My Lords, I see no other course open to me than to endeavour to ascertain what the words which were actually used in the contract mean—even though this means ascribing to some of them a meaning which was never canvassed in the courts below.

The RIBA building contract in which cl 30 appears places on the contractor the primary obligation to 'carry out and complete' the specified works 'in every respect to the reasonable satisfaction of the Architect' (cl 1 (1)). The contractor's obligation continues throughout two distinct consecutive periods. The first period, which I will call 'the construction period', starts when he is given possession of the site under cl 21 (1). It continues until he has completed the works to the satisfaction of the architect so far as the absence of any patent defects in materials or workmanship are concerned. It ends with the issue by the architect of a certificate of practical completion under cl 15 (1). This is the date of completion for the purpose of determining whether or not the contractor is in breach of his obligation to complete the works by the date so designated in the contract. The contractor then surrenders possession of the works to the employer, and the defects liability period starts. Where, as in the instant case, the employer takes possession of a part of the works before practical completion of the whole, the construction period for that part ends and the defects liability period for it begins.

The second period is the defects liability period. Its minimum duration is specified in the contract. If latent defects are discovered during this minimum period it is extended until the contractor has made them good and the architect has so certified. During this second period the contractor's obligation is to make good to the satisfaction of the architect any latent defects that may become apparent. After the end a of this second period the contractor is not liable to remedy any further defects; but the contract sum may be adjusted by reason of any defects which would not have been apparent on reasonable inspection or examination before the issue of the final certificate.

b During the construction period it may, and generally will, occur that from time to time some part of the works done by the contractor does not initially conform with the terms of the contract either because it is not in accordance with the contract drawings or the contract bills or because the quality of the workmanship or materials is below the standard required by cl 6(1). The contract places on the contractor the obligation to comply with any instructions of the architect to remedy any temporary disconformity with the requirements of the contract. If it is remedied no loss is sustained by the employer unless the time taken to remedy it results in practical completion being delayed beyond the date of completion designated in the contract.

c In this event the only loss caused is that the employer is kept out of the use of his building beyond the date on which it was agreed that it should be ready for use. For such delay liquidated damages at an agreed rate are payable under cl 22 of the contract.

d On a legalistic analysis it might be argued that temporary disconformity of any part of the works with the requirements of the contract even though remedied before the end of the agreed construction period constituted a breach of contract for which nominal damages would be recoverable. I do not think that makes business sense. Provided that the contractor puts it right timeously I do not think that the parties intended that any temporary disconformity should of itself amount to a breach of contract by the contractor.

e But during the second period, the defects liability period as designated or extended, the position is different. The contract contemplates that after the time of practical completion the employer shall have the use of the works for the purpose for which they were built. If the contractor gives possession to the employer of works which do not comply with the terms of the contract because of latent defects of workmanship or materials—the circumstances contemplated by cl 15 (2) and (3)—the employer may sustain consequential damage which cannot be recompensed by the contractors

f simply making good the defects. Nor does the breach involve any delay in completion within the meaning of cl 22, so as to give rise to any right to liquidated damages. The employer may have been deprived of the profitable use of the works or the defects may have resulted in damage to the employer's plant or goods in the works. Such consequential damage is not susceptible of anticipatory quantification. It may be much less or much greater than the damage which the employer would have

g sustained by delay in obtaining the use of the works if the date of practical completion had been deferred to the date when the latent defects subsequently discovered in the defects liability period had been put right.

h At common law a party to a contract is entitled to recover from the other party consequential damage of this kind resulting from that other party's breach of the contract, unless by the terms of the contract itself he has agreed that such damage shall not be recoverable. In the absence of express words in the contract a court should hesitate to hold that a party had surrendered any of his common law rights to damages for its breach, although it is not impossible for this to be a necessary implication from other provisions of the contract.

i I can read no such necessary implication into cl 15 or any other clause of the RIBA contract. Clause 15 imposes on the contractor a liability to mitigate the damage caused by his breach by making good the defects of construction at his own expense. It confers on him a corresponding right to do so. It is a necessary implication from this that the employer cannot, as he otherwise could, recover as damages from the contractor the difference between the value of the works if they had been constructed in conformity with the contract and their value in their defective condition, without first giving to the contractor the opportunity of making good the defects. The obverse of this coin is that the contractor is under an obligation to remedy the defects in accordance with the architect's instructions. If he does not do so, the employer can recover as damages the cost of remedying the defects, even though this cost is greater than the diminution in value of the works as a result of the unremedied defects.

But there are no express words in cl 15 which deal with consequential damage at all, notwithstanding that the clause is dealing with breaches of contract, i.e. 'materials or workmanship not in accordance with this Contract', discovered in circumstances in which it could be foreseen they would be likely to cause some consequential damage beyond that which is capable of mitigation by remedying the defects. I can see nothing in the provisions of cl 15 to which I have referred to give rise to any necessary implication that the employer was surrendering his right at common law to recover damages for any consequential loss sustained by him as a result of latent defects discovered during the defects liability period.

This being, as it seems to me, the business structure of the contract as respects the two periods into which the contractor's obligations fall, I come to examine the relevant provisions of cl 30 (i.e. sub-cl (6), (7) and (8)) which deal with the final certificate. Subclause (6) deals with its issue and its legal effect as creating a debt. Subclauses (7) and (8) deal with its evidential consequences.

Subclause (6) imposes on the architect a duty to issue the final certificate not later than three months after certain conditions are fulfilled. It cannot be issued until after the defects liability period has expired, but the subclause expressly contemplates that the final certificate must be issued notwithstanding that defects may have appeared during the defects liability period, as happened in the instant case. It provides that in that event the final certificate shall not be issued until completion of the remedial works by the contractor—a date which is itself fixed by a certificate of completion of making good the defects issued by the architect under cl 15 (4).

The final certificate, on its face, merely certifies two sums of money and the difference between them, which is the balance due to the contractor or the employer. Its issue creates a debt for the balance due to one of these parties by the other. It says nothing at all about the state of the works. The architect will have previously signified his satisfaction with their state at the end of the construction period (subject however to latent defects) by issuing his certificate of practical completion, and will have also previously signified his satisfaction with their condition at the end of the second period either by refraining from issuing a schedule of defects within 14 days after the expiration of the defects liability period under cl 15 (2) or by issuing a certificate of completion of remedial works under cl 15 (4). Both of these previous certificates and any failure to issue a schedule of defects the employer will have had an opportunity to dispute by referring to arbitration under cl 35 the question whether they were properly issued or withheld. In any such arbitration the arbitrator would have power to withdraw or open up, review and revise any disputed certificate, instruction or decision of the architect.

Clause 30 (7) nevertheless provides that the final certificate shall be 'conclusive evidence' not only of a matter to which it does refer, i.e. the adjustment of the contract sum, but also a matter to which it does not refer at all, i.e. 'that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract.' In their natural meaning, it seems to me that these words are dealing not primarily with the activities of the contractor but with the state of the works as a result of the activities of the contractor, and are dealing with their state at the time of issue of the certificate. They mean no more than that the works are in accordance with the contract drawings and contract bills, subject to any variations authorised by the architect under cl 11, and that the workmanship and materials are of the quality required by the contract. They do not mean that at no time previously to the issue of the final certificate were there defects in the works which required remedying and had been remedied, for sub-cl (6) expressly contemplates that the final certificate must be issued notwithstanding this; and the parties should not lightly be held to a have intended the final certificate to be conclusive evidence of the truth of anything that the certifier knew to be a lie.

This being, as I think, the natural meaning of the words directly under consideration, I turn to see whether it requires to be qualified because of the remaining provisions of sub-cl (7). It is to be observed that the final certificate is to have no evidential value as to any of the matters referred to in the latter part of the paragraph unless—

b ‘a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator shall have been given under clause 35 of these Conditions by either party before the Final Certificate has been issued or by the Contractor within 14 days after such issue . . .’

This is obviously an elliptical phrase. ‘A written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator’ forms no part of the procedure in referring a dispute to arbitration under cl 35 if the parties agree on an arbitrator themselves. It would be quite irrational to make the evidential effect of a final certificate dependent on whether or not in an arbitration pending at the time of the issue of the final certificate the arbitrator had been appointed as a result of a written notice to concur instead of by agreement without such notice. Both parties, indeed, concede that it is a necessary implication that an agreement to refer a dispute to arbitration by an agreed arbitrator must have been intended to have the same consequences on the evidential effect of the final certificate as a written notice to concur in the appointment of the arbitrator. Furthermore, the phrase says nothing expressly about the nature of the dispute which must have been referred to arbitration. Yet disputes can arise under the contract which have nothing to do with the state of the works at any stage before or after the end of the construction period or the defects liability period. For instance, there may be a dispute arising under cl 7 which deals with the right of the employer to indemnify for infringements of patents, or cl 19 which deals with the obligation of the contractor to insure. It would be quite irrational for the parties to make the evidential effect of a final certificate dependent on the existence or non-existence of a pending arbitration in a dispute which had nothing to do with any of the matters of which the final certificate was to be conclusive evidence. It seems to me to be also a necessary implication that a prior reference to arbitration was intended to deprive the final certificate of its conclusive character only in those cases where the dispute referred to arbitration was one concerning the subject matter of which the final certificate was made conclusive evidence.

My Lords, if cl 30 (7) is so construed, the system of certification provided for in the contract culminating in the final certificate makes business sense. The primary obligation of the contractor is to carry out and complete the work to the reasonable satisfaction of the architect. Prima facie the standard to be attained is a subjective one set by the architect, subject only to the qualification that it must be reasonable.

In the course of the progress of the works during the construction period until practical completion the architect signifies his satisfaction by the issue of interim certificates. By issuing his certificate of practical completion he signifies his satisfaction with the state of the works at the end of the construction period; but this is subject to any latent defects which may become apparent to him during the defects liability period. If none becomes apparent, he signifies his satisfaction with the state of the works at the end of the defects liability period by refraining from issuing a schedule of defects within the next 14 days. If latent defects do become apparent during the defects liability period and are either the subject of a schedule of defects or of written instructions by the architect to make good, he signifies his satisfaction that they have been made good by issuing a certificate to that effect under cl 15 (4).

But the contract also provides that the parties may dispute the reasonableness of the architect’s satisfaction as to any of these matters. The only method of doing so provided by the contract is by arbitration under cl 35. It is expressly provided by cl 30 (8) that none of these previous certificates of the architect shall be conclusive evidence as to the condition of the works, materials or goods to which it relates; and, by cl 35 (3) that any of them may be treated by the arbitrator as if it had never been issued. a

My Lords, in a contract of this character, there is good business sense in agreeing on a time limit, shorter than that laid down by general statutes of limitation, within which any claims must be brought either for breaches of contract generally or, alternatively, for breaches of contract of a particular kind. If it was intended to do the former it would be very simple to state this in an express provision. There are many precedents to be found in business contracts, but there is no such provision in the contract. Even cl 35 itself imposes no time limit within which disputes must be referred to arbitration. b

Disputes under the contract may be of two kinds: disputes, on the one hand, as to whether the architect acted reasonably in signifying his satisfaction of the way in which the works had been carried out or completed or in ordering adjustments to be made to the contract sum, and disputes, on the other hand, as to matters in respect of which the architect has no functions to perform. In a contract by which the parties have agreed to accept 'the reasonable satisfaction of the Architect' as the prima facie criterion as to whether particular obligations under the contract have been performed, there is good business sense in distinguishing breaches of these obligations from other obligations arising under the contract, and in providing a time limit after which neither party can dispute the reasonableness of any satisfaction he has expressed as to the performance of any such obligation. In my opinion, this is what is done by cl 30 (6) and (7). c

The date of issue of the final certificate is so fixed by cl 30 (6) that the parties will have already had an opportunity of referring to arbitration under cl 35 any dispute about the reasonableness of the satisfaction signified by the architect as to the condition of the works at the time that any previous certificate was issued by him, or about the reasonableness of any decision by him as to any adjustments to the contract sum which is necessary in accordance with the terms of the contract. If either party has availed himself of this opportunity, the final certificate has no evidential effect. But if neither party has done so before the issue of the final certificate (or in the case of the contractor within 14 days thereafter), both parties are deprived of any further right to dispute that the architect's satisfaction was not reasonable or that the obligation of which performance to his reasonable satisfaction was the criterion had not been performed; or that the adjustment to the contract sum was not properly made. d

This, in my judgment, is the effect of the provision in cl 30 (7) which makes the final certificate conclusive evidence that the works have been properly carried out and completed in all respects in accordance with the conditions of this contract. I can see no grounds in language or in reason for limiting its evidential effect to proceedings started after the date of the certificate. It is relevant evidence only if a fact to be proved in the proceedings is that the works have been properly carried out and completed to the reasonable satisfaction of the architect. There is no principle of law which prevents parties to litigation from agreeing in advance what shall be treated as conclusive evidence of a relevant fact—at any rate if such agreement is not a mere sham to induce the court to decide a hypothetical question on a hypothesis of fact known by both parties to be false (*Kerr v John Mottram Ltd*¹). e

The way in which cl 30 (7) works in practice is well-illustrated by the two actions which have been consolidated and are the subject of the instant appeal. The first action was brought during the defects liability period for the part of the works of which possession had been taken under the provisions for sectional completion to be found in cl 16. Two claims were advanced by the employers. The first was as to the liability of the contractors for consequential damage resulting from latent defects which had appeared during the defects liability period in respect of which remedial f

a measures had already been undertaken by the contractors on the instructions of the architect. Under the contract the architect had the duty of satisfying himself whether there were defects but he had no functions in respect of any claim for consequential damage. His opinion whether such a claim was justified or not was irrelevant. The second claim was for unliquidated damages representing the cost of further remedial measures had already been undertaken by the contractors to make the works comply with the terms of the contract. As I have pointed out earlier, this kind of claim was
b premature, even if it were well-founded, since under the contract the contractor had the right, as well as the duty, to undertake any further remedial works himself in accordance with the instructions, and to the reasonable satisfaction of, the architect. By the date at which the reply and defence to counterclaim had been delivered, the final certificate had been issued under cl 30 (6). Accordingly, the architect must c have been satisfied either that no further remedial measures were needed at the date of the first action to bring the works into conformity with the terms of the contract at the end of the defects liability period, or that such further measures as were needed had been satisfactorily completed. Of the fact that his satisfaction was reasonable, the final certificate was conclusive evidence. By the time of the hearing of the preliminary issue the employers had lost their opportunity to dispute this and, accordingly, of proving their claim, which had been prematurely advanced, for the cost of d any remedial measures. The final certificate, however, was irrelevant to the claim for consequential damage. It could have no effect on it.

In the second action, brought after the date of the final certificate, identical claims were made in the defence and counterclaim, except that the date at which it claimed that further remedial measures were still necessary to make the works conform with the requirements of the contract was after the expiry of the period during which
e the contractor would have had the right, as well as the duty, to execute them himself. But the same principle applies. The final certificate is conclusive evidence that all necessary remedial works had been executed by the time of its issue. It, too, is irrelevant to the claim for consequential damage in respect of defects which had been found during the defects liability period.

f It follows that the employers are, in my view, entitled to rely on their defence and counterclaim in each of the consolidated actions to the extent that it claims the consequential damage for the disturbance occasioned to their business while defects which appeared during the defects liability period were being made good by the contractor. This damage is quantified at £13,464 15s 7d. But they are not entitled to rely on the allegation contained in the particulars of special damage that still g further remedial works will have to be carried out or to claim any damages in respect of this unquantified loss.

I would for my part allow the appeal, decide the two preliminary issues in favour of the contractors, set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal² and order that the actions be remitted to the official referee for hearing on the employers' defence and counterclaim so far as it relates to consequential damage.

In exercise of the power conferred on him by s 12 of the Courts Act 1971 the Lord Chancellor hereby gives the following direction:

1. Solicitors may appear in, conduct, defend and address the court in proceedings mentioned in para 2 of this direction at any sitting of the Crown Court at Caernarvon, Barnstaple, Bodmin, Doncaster or (subject to para 3 hereof) Lincoln.

2. The proceedings in which solicitors may exercise the right of audience conferred by para 1 of this direction are: (a) appeals from magistrates' courts; (b) proceedings on committal of a person for sentence or to be dealt with; (c) proceedings in respect of the offences included in class 4 in the directions given by the Lord Chief Justice with concurrence of the Lord Chancellor under ss 4 (5) and 5 (4) of the Courts Act 1971¹; and (d) proceedings under the original or appellate civil jurisdiction of the Crown Court.

3. The right of audience conferred by para 1 of this direction in respect of sittings of the Crown Court at Lincoln shall extend only to proceedings falling within para 2 hereof: (a) on appeal from, or on committal by, a magistrates' court in the County of the Parts of Holland, or (b) which would, but for the passing of the Courts Act 1971, have fallen to be heard by the court of quarter sessions for that county in the exercise of its original or appellate civil jurisdiction.

4. This direction shall come into force on 1st January 1972.

FAMILY DIVISION

Probate – Practice – Non-contentious probate – Foreign divorces – Recognition.

The Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations Act 1971 comes into force on 1st January 1972.

As from that date the following practice will apply in unopposed probate applications: (a) A decree of divorce granted on or after 1st January 1972 by a court in Scotland, Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man will be recognised in the same way as a decree granted in England and Wales, irrespective of the domicile of the deceased. (b) A decree of divorce, whenever granted, by a court in an overseas country as defined in the Act will be recognised if the oath shows that at the date of commencement of the proceedings resulting in the decree: (i) the parties were domiciled in that country; (ii) either spouse was habitually resident in that country; or (iii) either spouse was a national of that country; or exceptionally if one of these facts is recorded in the decree itself (see s 5 of the Act).

In all other cases, including a case in which it is alleged that a divorce was obtained by extra-judicial proceedings, a full statement of the facts should be submitted to a registrar for decision. The registrar, after consideration of the facts, will decide whether further evidence of facts or law is necessary.

The appellant, a fitter, lifted a heavy piece of metal during the course of his work. He felt a pain in his back and appeared pale and ill. He was subsequently admitted

e to hospital where, after examination, he was diagnosed as having myocardial infarction. He claimed injury benefit under s 7 (1)^a of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946 on the ground that he had suffered ‘personal injury caused . . . by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment’. His claim was rejected by the insurance officer on the ground that there was no injury caused by accident within the meaning of s 7 (1). He appealed. The local appeal tribunal made a full

f investigation and heard medical evidence. They allowed the claim stating that the symptoms ‘noted shortly after the accident were in fact those of Infarction though not then recognised as such, also that the work he was engaged on at the time was exceptionally heavy for him as a fitter’. In due course the appellant claimed disablement benefit in respect of the accident and, as required by s 36 (1) (c)^b of the 1946 Act, his claim went to a medical board. They rejected the finding of the local appeal

g tribunal, holding that the appellant had suffered two separate disabilities, strained chest and myocardial infarction, and that the former was, but the latter was not, caused by the work which he had been doing when he became ill. This decision was confirmed by the medical appeal tribunal and on appeal the National Insurance Commissioner upheld it as not being erroneous in point of law. On appeal against the refusal of an application for certiorari to quash the decision of the commissioner

h the Court of Appeal^c distinguished the decision of the House of Lords in Re Dowling^d on the ground that in that case there was a single injury which itself constituted the accident, whereas in the present case the statutory authority (i.e. the local appeal tribunal) had found two injuries either of which would have justified the issue of injury benefit; accordingly it was open to the medical authorities (i.e. the medical board and medical appeal tribunal) to conclude that only one of those injuries was, for the purpose of disablement benefit, the result of the accident, without thereby or destroying the basis of their own jurisdiction. On appeal to the House of Lords, the respondent sought to argue that if Dowling's case^e could not be distinguished it should be reconsidered and overruled. a

Held (Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Wilberforce dissenting) – The appeal would be allowed and the application for certiorari granted for the following reasons—

(i) (per Lord Reid, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest and Lord Pearson) on the true construction of the 1946 Act, a decision by the statutory authorities, in determining a claim for injury benefit, that the claimant had suffered an injury arising out of an accident suffered in the course of his employment was, by virtue of s 36 (3)^f, 'final' and consequently it was not open to the medical authorities, in subsequently determining for the purposes of a claim to disablement benefit whether the relevant accident had resulted in a loss of faculty, etc, to come to the conclusion that the claimant had not in fact suffered the injury in question as a result of the accident; that was so whether or not there were other injuries found by the statutory authorities and accepted by the medical authorities as having occurred to the claimant as a result of the accident; accordingly, in the present case, the medical authorities had no jurisdiction to come to the conclusion that the appellant's myocardial infarction was not caused by the work which he had been doing at the time when he became ill; it followed that Dowling's case^e was rightly decided (see p 149 j, p 150 c and f, p 151 b, p 154 e, g and j to p 155 a, p 156 b and c, p 157 h, p 158 b and c, p 177 f, g and j to p 178 a, c and e to g, and p 179 d and e, post). b
d

(ii) (Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Wilberforce concurring) the present appeal was not distinguishable from Dowling's case^e; the application of that decision could not be limited to cases where an accident had resulted in a single injury not susceptible of further diagnosis into more than one injury; nor could it be limited to injury occurring as the result, not of some fortuitous incident, but in the course of the ordinary work that the claimant was employed to do; the principle established in Dowling's case^e was that a previous decision by the statutory authorities that one or more injuries suffered by the claimant was a result of the accident, was final and binding on the medical authorities (see p 148 f and g, p 155 b, p 169 b, p 172 d, p 178 j, p 181 c to e, p 188 j to p 189 a, p 194 b, p 195 h and p 196 c, post); e

(iii) (per Lord Reid, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, Lord Pearson and Lord Simon of Glaisdale) Dowling's case^e should not be overruled; the power of the House of Lords to depart from one of its previous decisions should only be sparingly exercised, for the advantage of finality should not be thrown away too readily; a difference of view on a matter of statutory construction, largely a matter of impression, would rarely by itself provide a suitable occasion for departing from a previous decision; in the present case no broad issue of justice or public policy was involved nor any question of legal principle; furthermore it had not been shown that the construction adopted in Dowling's case^e was causing administrative difficulties or individual injustice (see p 149 f and g, p 150 f, p 154 a, p 155 b, p 174 a to f, and p 196 d to p 197 j, post); g

(iv) (per Lord Diplock) although a majority were of opinion that the ratio decidendi of Dowling's case^e was wrong, only a minority of three were prepared to overrule it and, since a minority had no power to do this, it must be accepted that the principle established by Dowling's case^e governed the present appeal (see p 189 f, post); h

- h 16th December. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID. My Lords, these conjoined appeals arise out of two claims for disablement benefit made under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Acts. The appellant Jones's case arises under the Act of 1946, the appellant Hudson's case under the Act of 1965; but there is no substantial difference between the relevant provisions of the two Acts. The Acts provide three kinds of benefit—j injury benefit, disablement benefit and death benefit. We are not concerned with the last and the provisions with regard to it throw little or no light on the matters raised in this appeal. Injury benefit is available when the man is unfit for work with a maximum duration of six months. Disablement benefit is available after injury benefit has ceased or immediately if there is no claim for injury benefit.

The appellant Jones was a fitter. On 27th February 1964 he was lifting a heavy piece of metal. He felt a pain in his back and seemed pale and ill. He saw his doctor and was admitted to hospital the next day. The first diagnosis was strain and injury to his back but when he was sent to another hospital they immediately on 17th March diagnosed myocardial infarction. He claimed injury benefit but the insurance officer rejected the claim on the ground that there was no injury by accident within the meaning of the Act. He then appealed to the local appeal tribunal. They made a full investigation and heard medical evidence. They allowed his claim saying that they were—

‘Satisfied that appellant had no previous history of cardiac infarction and that the symptoms noted shortly after the accident were in fact those of Infarction though not then recognised as such, also that the work he was engaged on at the time was exceptionally heavy for him as a fitter.’

Then in due course the appellant Jones claimed disablement benefit. His claim went, as required by the Act, to a medical board. They rejected the finding of the local tribunal. They held that when they saw the appellant there were two separate disabilities, strained chest and myocardial infarction, and that the former was but the latter was not caused by the work which he was doing when he became ill. The finding of the local tribunal appears to me to mean that they held that these two conditions were connected both having been caused by the man’s work. The case then went to the medical appeal tribunal. Their finding was:

‘Upon hearing the [appellant’s] representative, reading the various documents précised and (aloud) the notes of evidence from the local appeal Tribunal, the Tribunal found no reason to disagree with the Medical Board’s findings and decision. The Tribunal are not satisfied that upon the balance of probabilities the relevant accident played any part, either by cause or contribution, in the infarction.’

The commissioner held this finding not to be erroneous in law and so he dismissed the appellant Jones’s appeal.

A similar disagreement between the medical and other tribunals was fully considered by this House in *Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union (Re Dowling)*¹. In the courts below these cases have been distinguished but the distinction in the appellant Jones’s case appears to me to be put on inadequate grounds. In Dowling’s case¹ the medical authorities totally rejected the earlier decision of the statutory authorities. In this case they rejected the view that all the man’s disabilities were connected and arose from the same cause and they also rejected the main finding of the statutory authority that the heart condition was caused by the man’s work.

The present appeals were first heard some months ago by a committee of five Lords of Appeal. The respondent then sought to argue that the decision of this House in Dowling’s case¹ should be reconsidered under the new practice initiated five years ago by intimation in this House of a unanimous resolution of the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary in these terms²:

‘Their lordships regard the use of precedent as an indispensable foundation upon which to decide what is the law and its application to individual cases. It provides at least some degree of certainty upon which individuals can rely in the conduct of their affairs, as well as a basis for orderly development of legal rules.

‘Their lordships nevertheless recognise that too rigid adherence to precedent may lead to injustice in a particular case and also unduly restrict the proper development of the law. They propose therefore to modify their present practice

- a and, while treating former decisions of this House as normally binding, to depart from a previous decision when it appears right to do so.
- In this connexion they will bear in mind the danger of disturbing retrospectively the basis on which contracts, settlements of property and fiscal arrangements have been entered into and also the especial need for certainty as to the criminal law.
- b 'This announcement is not intended to affect the use of precedent elsewhere than in this House.'

It was then thought proper that these appeals should be re-argued before a committee of seven of your Lordships and we have heard full argument of all issues raised in these appeals.

- c My understanding of the position when this resolution was adopted was and is that there were a comparatively small number of reported decisions of this House which were generally thought to be impeding the proper development of the law or to have led to results which were unjust or contrary to public policy and that such decisions should be reconsidered as opportunities arose. But this practice was not to be used to weaken existing certainty in the law. The old view was that any departure from rigid adherence to precedent would weaken that certainty. I did not
- d and do not accept that view. It is notorious that where an existing decision is disapproved but cannot be overruled courts tend to distinguish it on inadequate grounds. I do not think that they act wrongly in so doing; they are adopting the less bad of the only alternatives open to them. But this is bound to lead to uncertainty for no one can say in advance whether in a particular case the court will or will not feel bound to follow the old unsatisfactory decision. On balance it seems to me that
- e overruling such a decision will promote and not impair the certainty of the law.

- But that certainty will be impaired unless this practice is used sparingly. I would not seek to categorise cases in which it should or cases in which it should not be used. As time passes experience will supply some guide. But I would venture the opinion that the typical case for reconsidering an old decision is where some broad issue is involved, and that it should only be in rare cases that we should reconsider
- f questions of construction of statutes or other documents. In very many cases it cannot be said positively that one construction is right and the other wrong. Construction so often depends on weighing one consideration against another. Much may depend on one's approach. If more attention is paid to meticulous examination of the language used in the statute the result may be different from that reached by paying more attention to the apparent object of the statute so as to adopt that meaning
- g of the words under consideration which best accord with it.

- Holding these views, I am firmly of opinion *Dowling's case*³ ought not to be reconsidered. No broad issue of justice or public policy is involved nor is any question of legal principle. The issue is simply the proper construction of complicated provisions in a statute. There must be a large number of decisions of this House of this character. Possibly some of your Lordships may think the decision in *Dowling's case*³ more wrong than most of them. But a decision to reconsider *Dowling's case*³ would I think encourage those who would like to see others of such decisions reversed, to think that litigation for that purpose might be worthwhile and would have a rather far-reaching tendency to impair existing certainty. Moreover, if the decision in *Dowling's case*³ is causing administrative difficulties in the respondent's department—as to which I have no knowledge—then the respondent is in a position to seek
- j amendment of the Act.

As a result of the somewhat prolonged rehearing, I have perhaps a better appreciation of the case against *Dowling's decision*³ than I had when I concurred in it. But on balance I still think that it was right. I do not think it necessary to go over the whole ground again. I shall only state in outline the two main points.

The first is the meaning of what is now s 50 (1) of the Act of 1965: 'Except as provided by this Part of this Act, any decision of a claim or question in accordance with this Part of this Act shall be final.' One must I think construe this in light of normal cases and not of exceptional or improbable cases which received much attention in argument. Normally an injured man first claims injury benefit. In the vast majority of cases there is no difficulty and the insurance officer can and does act speedily. But if there is difficulty he is in a position to, and does, make full investigation and, if necessary, obtain medical reports. If he decides against the claimant the case can go to the local appeal tribunal and they can and do hear evidence including medical evidence. Then they reach a decision to which, in my view, s 50 (2) applies. There was much argument about the meaning of the word 'question'. I think it has a wide meaning: indeed s 50 (2) (g) shows this. Then the man will frequently claim disablement benefit. Here for the first time a medical board comes in for the purpose of deciding what, if any, is the extent of his disablement resulting from 'the relevant accident'. It seems to me improbable that Parliament should have intended duplication of enquiry. 'Final' is a word with many meanings. I recognise the strength of the respondent's arguments but, on the whole, I think that on this point *Dowling's case*⁴ was right.

The other point in *Dowling's case*⁴ was slightly different. In most cases accident and injury are easily distinguishable. But in cases such as we are considering the only 'accident' is the occurrence of an internal injury such as hernia and some heart condition. It was argued that 'accident' may simply mean incident so that where the man undergoes some unusual strain which brings on the internal lesion or injury an unusual strain could be regarded as the accident. That seems to me to be rather far-fetched but even so it would not cover a case where continuous heavy work brought about the injury—there would be no incident to which one could point as the cause of the injury. In such cases the occurrence of the injury is the only incident which could be regarded as an 'accident'.

The question which a medical board has to answer is (s 37 (a) of the 1965 Act) 'whether the relevant accident has resulted in a loss of faculty'. In my view, it must accept the finding of the statutory authority as to what was the relevant accident. I agree with what was said in *Dowling's case*⁴ on that matter. But even if I thought now that *Dowling's case*⁴ was wrongly decided I would still be of opinion that on grounds of public policy it ought not to be reconsidered.

It was strenuously argued in *Dowling's case*⁴ that the scheme and policy of this legislation is that medical questions should be decided by medical tribunals. That is no longer maintained by the respondent because it is clear that, in dealing with injury and death benefit, the statutory lay tribunals have to consider and determine just as difficult medical questions as those which the respondent maintains are reserved for medical tribunals in disablement cases. They do it as courts of law do it: they receive medical evidence or reports and adjudicate on them. No one suggests that they are not adequately equipped to do that. It appears to me that the main purpose of bringing medical boards and tribunals in to deal with disablement cases is to deal expeditiously with the highly technical matter of assessing percentage of disability.

They are not equipped to deal with more general questions involving matters not purely medical although sometimes they may have to. Before the medical board the claimant is not represented, he is only medically examined. Before the medical appeal tribunals there could be argument but it appears that there seldom is. These cases and a number of other reported decisions to which reference was made in argument illustrate the difficulty. It has happened in several cases that a man with no previous record of heart trouble has suddenly become ill under strain at work and quite soon afterwards myocardial infarction or some similar condition has been diagnosed. Of course it could be a mere coincidence that a man suffers a strain at work and that soon after he has heart trouble for the first time in his life although the two are quite unconnected. But the odds against that must be very high. And if you get a series of such coincidences the odds become astronomical if the two are never connected. But there is no means of submitting this powerful argument to medical boards or tribunals and no indication that it has ever been considered by them. I am very far from being convinced that it can have been the intention of Parliament or that it would be to the advantage of claimants to give to these medical authorities the power to overrule considered decisions of the statutory authorities.

b The appellant Hudson's case is much more difficult. The facts are peculiar and must be almost unprecedented. Whichever way it is decided I doubt whether it can be of much value as a precedent. I do not think it necessary to say more than that I concur in the view that there is no sufficient reason for distinguishing the appellant Hudson's case from the appellant Jones's case. I would therefore allow both appeals.

c LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, prior to the coming into operation of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946, there was a liability in an employer to pay compensation to a workman who was caused personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. The Act of 1946 provided, in substitution for the Workmen's Compensation Acts, a system of compulsory contributory insurance. Under the Workman's Compensation Act 1897, and also under the Act of 1906, the liability of an employer to pay compensation arose in respect of the employments to which the Acts applied if 'personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment' was caused to a workman. Under the Act of 1946 the risk insured against is the same. There are various kinds of benefit but they only become payable 'where an insured person suffers personal injury caused on or after the appointed day by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment'. I quote from s 7 of the Act. The employment must, of course, be insurable employment. So that ever since the last century the conception of personal injury caused by accident has been a familiar one. The perplexities and disputations which used to be in orbit around the words 'arising out of and in the course of' have been considerably dispelled because (in the absence of evidence to the contrary) an accident which arises in the course of employment is now deemed also to have arisen out of such employment (see s 7 (4)).

What, then, is personal injury caused by accident? The Act contains no definition of accident. Nor is there a definition of 'personal injury caused by accident'. If a man's work requires him to lift something heavy his day-to-day operations may be entirely uneventful. If, however, one day in the course of his work some heart affliction befalls him has he suffered 'personal injury caused by accident'? On one view of the matter there would have been no accident. In lifting what he had to lift the man would only have been doing what he intended to do and wanted to do and was employed to do. It would not be as though something had struck him or as though he had stumbled or fallen down. Yet it is most probable that the decision would be that the man had suffered personal injury caused by accident. In reaching a decision guidance would be provided by a study of cases such as *Fenton v Thorley & Co Ltd*⁵ and *Clover Clayton & Co Ltd v Hughes*⁶.

Part II of the Act of 1946 describes the benefits which an insured person will have a right to receive or which in the event of his death others will have a right to receive. Part III of the Act lays down how questions and claims are to be determined. Basic to the whole scheme of the Act are the words at the beginning of s 7 (1). The various kinds of benefit can only become payable if it is first decided that the insured person suffered 'personal injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, being insurable employment'. Unless that is affirmatively held there can be no benefit. If it is so decided then under some circumstances there may be injury benefit; in some circumstances there may be disablement benefit; in some circumstances there may be death benefit. a Different persons decide different questions. I do not propose to set out the details of the statutory provisions. They were all reviewed in the recent decision in *Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union (Re Dowling)*⁷. It is, however, clear that apart from 'special questions' (some of which are 'disablement questions') 'any claim for benefit and any question arising in connection with a claim for or award of benefit' must be determined by an insurance officer, a local appeal tribunal or the commissioner. b

6 [1910] AC 242, [1908-10] All ER Rep 220

If a question arises whether a person employed in insurable employment has suffered personal injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment that question is to be determined by an insurance officer subject, where so provided, to appeal to the local appeal tribunal and further appeal to the commissioner. So (subject to appeal) it is for an insurance officer to decide (inter alia) whether there has been 'personal injury caused by accident'. In the sort of situation which is illustrated by *Fenton v Thorley*⁸ an insurance officer may have to consider the available evidence as to what actually happened and may necessarily have to consider medical evidence. In an infinite variety of other situations difficult problems may arise. But before anyone can get any benefit an insurance officer (or on appeal a tribunal or the commissioner) must decide that there has been personal injury caused by accident. Under the scheme of the Act a medical board is not charged to reach decision as to that matter. The decision of the insurance officer may identify and may necessarily identify the nature of the personal injury or injuries caused by accident. Decision as to whether there was 'personal injury caused by accident' may involve findings in some detail as to what happened. There will sometimes but not always be some incident which could be designated as the accident and some physical hurt which could be designated as the physical injury. There may in some cases be a decision that two or more injuries were caused by accident. There may in some cases be a decision which identifies the personal injury caused by accident but which shows that the stated injuries were not the only injuries. But as the occasions or situations which will give rise to a right to benefit will in the nature of things be diverse it is not to be expected that there will be uniformity in the pattern of decisions. c d e f

Part III of the Act deals with the determination of questions and claims. A clear distinction is drawn between 'questions' and 'claims'. Under s 36 (1) certain defined questions are to be determined by the Minister and other defined questions by a medical board (or medical appeal tribunal) but beyond this 'any claim for benefit and any question arising in connection with a claim for or award of benefit' must be determined by an insurance officer or on appeal from him (see s 36 (2)). So apart from defined special questions all other questions and all claims are to be decided (subject to appeal as provided by the Act) by an insurance officer. What then, apart from a special question, is a 'question' as opposed to a 'claim'? It will be a question whether an insured person has suffered 'personal injury caused on or after the appointed day by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment'. That will be in all cases the question of central consequence. There may be other 'questions' which arise 'in connection with a claim'. These, in my view, will be such as in the circumstances of a particular case it will be necessary and essential for an insurance officer to decide either as a preliminary to or as a part of his decision that an insured person has suffered personal injury caused by accident. Subject to appeal or as provided by the Act 'any decision of a claim or question' is final. Much discussion has taken place in regard to the meaning in the structure of the Act of the word 'final'. The attribute or quality of finality is given not only to a decision on a g h i a claim but also to a decision on a question. Section 7 (1) shows that it is only after certain questions have been decided that any claims can arise. If there has been personal injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of employment 'then' certain claims may arise. There may be injury benefit if certain conditions are satisfied (see s 7 (1) (a)). It will be for the insurance officer, if he has decided the first question, to go on to decide whether a claim for injury benefit is sustainable.

b If there has been personal injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of employment (this question being for an insurance officer to decide) then disablement benefit may later be payable if there is a loss of physical or mental faculty. This must be suffered 'as the result of the injury' (see s 7 (1) (b)) and 'as the result of the relevant accident' (see s 12 (1)). The fact that both these expressions are used merely illustrates that the base and foundation of any claim is that an insured person will have suffered personal injury caused by accident. The relevant accident (see s 88)

c is the accident in respect of which benefit is claimed or payable. So if disablement benefit is claimed it must be claimed in respect of the accident that has been the subject of a decision of an insurance officer. If an insurance officer decided that personal injury caused by accident had not been suffered then disablement benefit could not be payable. If he decided that it had been suffered then a disablement

d question might arise, i.e. a question whether the accident had resulted in a loss of faculty and a further question as to the extent of disablement that resulted from a loss of faculty. Those questions would be for determination by a medical board or medical appeal tribunal. But those questions can only arise after a decision on the basic question (i.e. that denoted by the opening words of s 7 (1)) has been made. That decision cannot be assailed by or ignored by a medical board. A medical board must accept it and act on it. This was laid down in *Dowling's case*⁹.

There were two routes by which conclusion was reached in this House in that case. There was the approach in the majority decision which now, subject to argument on this point, is binding, and which was based on the statutory provision making a decision final; there was the approach that, apart from the express statutory provision as to finality, the remit to a medical board was for a determination as to the result

f of a 'relevant accident' so that no enquiry whether there was a relevant accident or as to what was the relevant accident was ever within the competence of or within the terms of reference of a medical board. I doubt whether there is much practical difference between the two approaches. If it is sought to interpret the word 'final' as being limited to finality in respect of a claim then the result follows that on a claim for disablement benefit there must as to one part of the claim be a determination by an insurance officer (or a local appeal tribunal or the commissioner) and as

g to another (and much more limited) part a determination by a medical board or medical appeal tribunal. The finality (in connection with or in relation to a claim for disablement benefit) of a decision which an insurance officer (or an appeal authority) must make before any claim for disablement benefit can succeed must therefore be recognised.

h It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the word 'final' in s 36 (3) must denote finality within a sphere or compartment. I agree. A decision is final if it is a decision as to a matter within the jurisdiction of a particular authority. Neither an insurance officer, on the one hand, nor a medical board, on the other hand, can decide any claim or question other than one which under the statutory provisions is assigned to his or its sphere or compartment of duty. Neither must encroach on j the other. Each appellant in the cases now being considered complains that a medical board has trespassed outside its statutorily defined sphere or compartment. Accordingly, I consider that the present appeals depend for their determination on a careful examination of the facts in order to see the stages of decisions in regard to claims or questions and to see whether they were reached within the powers and duties prescribed by statute.

If there is in the result any practical difference between the two approaches in *Dowling's case*¹⁰, I am clearly of the view that no justification has been established for not following the decision (i.e. the decision of the majority). It is said that the case of *Inland Revenue Comrs v Brooks*¹¹ was not cited in the arguments in *Dowling's case*¹⁰. While it has been helpful and desirable in the present appeal to refer to *Brooks's case*¹¹ an examination of it shows that that decision depended entirely on the construction of the Act then in question, the Finance (1909-10) Act 1910, which was an Act creating super-tax, and of the Acts incorporated with it. In reference to income tax it had been enacted by s 57 (10) of the Taxes Management Act 1880 that appeals once determined by the General Commissioners should be final. Did such a determination take effect on an initial estimation for the purpose of assessing another and new tax (even if such new tax was an additional duty of income tax)? It was held not. As Earl Loreburn said¹²:

'When, therefore, another tax is imposed by another statute, whether it be a duty of income tax or not, and a different tribunal is directed to estimate the same figure as part of a greater whole, I do not read the section as imposing upon the new tribunal a duty to accept the determination of the old.'

The case concerned what Lord Sumner called¹³ 'the dry interpretation of the section'. I do not find in that decision any particular guidance which directs the process of consideration and interpretation of the enactment now being examined.

The Act in some places uses the word 'final' and in other places the word 'conclusive'. Whatever differences there may be in other statutes and in other contexts between the word 'final' and the word 'conclusive' I cannot think that for the purposes of the present appeals there is any significance to be drawn from the circumstances that the two words are used in the Act. In s 36 (3) decisions are made final except as provided. The Act provides for certain appeals. So clearly the word 'final' is not used as denoting that there is to be no appeal from a decision. It may be that the word 'conclusive' rather than 'final' is used in s 72 because the word 'conclusive' is apposite in reference to a situation where a decision is being given in evidence for the purpose of other proceedings. Similarly, if a declaration is made under s 49 and is then being used for the purposes of a claim the use of the word 'conclusive' may be apposite. But if a decision of a claim or question is made by the person or authority to whom the statute delegates the duty of making decision in regard to such claim or question then the decision is final in the sense that it cannot be disregarded or flouted by some other person or authority not charged with the duty of reaching decision in regard to such claim or question.

This point may be illustrated. There will be some cases where there is no specific occurrence which can be described as an accident. A man may suffer a heart condition while at work. A difficult question may arise. Has he suffered personal injury caused by accident? Skilled medical evidence may be needed. There may be differences of medical opinion. There may be much evidence of a non-medical nature. There may be conflict of evidence as to the events or circumstances in regard to the work which was being done by the man or in regard to his conduct. An insurance officer may have to reach decision. If in the result it is decided (either by the insurance officer or on appeal) that there was no injury caused by accident then no claim for disablement benefit would follow. If in the result it is decided that there was injury by accident there may be a claim for disablement benefit and a medical board may then have to decide whether the accident has resulted in a loss of faculty. The medical board cannot say, 'There never was an accident'. It may be that they will disagree with the medical evidence that was given before an insurance officer or on appeal from him. It may be that as a consequence they will think a that there never was an accident and that accordingly there never was a question which should have been submitted for their determination. But they must only act, as also must every other statutory authority created by the legislation, within their own sphere or compartment.

b It follows from what I have said that I see no reason to doubt the validity of the decision in *Dowling's case*¹⁴. In any event, it would, in my view, be wholly inappropriate not to treat it as binding authority. It was essentially a decision which involved questions of construction of the statutory provisions. If any proposals for change are now suggested it should be for Parliament to consider and to decide whether they are either necessary or desirable. I pass, then, to consider the two cases which are before us. The application of the statutory scheme may helpfully be illustrated by reference to these actual cases.

c On 27th February 1964 the appellant Jones was doing his work at the quarry where he was employed. He was loading some cast iron scraps on to a wagon. That was a task that he was required to do. Something happened. He felt a pain in his back. The pain got worse. He was sent home and was seen by his doctor who thought that he was suffering from a strain in the back and shoulder. The next day he got up in order to see his doctor. He had pain in the front of his chest. He was sent home d to bed where he remained for some days. On 9th March 1964 he was admitted to his local hospital. He was there for one night and was X-rayed. He was then transferred to another hospital and coronary infarction was diagnosed. He remained in hospital for over two months. Later medical certificates used the expressions 'Myocarditis', 'Strain of Back (Inj) and myocarditis', 'Myocardial Sprain' and 'Myocardial Strain'.

e A claim for injury benefit was made. So the insurance officer had to consider the matter. While recognising that the insured person had been treated for 'Myocardial Infarction' as an in-patient in hospital for over two months, he thought that there was a doubt whether the incapacity was 'due to any accident or whether in fact there was any accident'. Accordingly, he had to reach conclusion. Medical opinions were sought both of the appellant's doctor and from the hospital. The former wrote (on 9th July 1964) as follows:

f '[The appellant] was visited on 27/2/64 when he appeared to be suffering from a strain in back and shoulder on the left side. Next day he was pyrexial and this went on to dyspnoea, cough and a vague pain in the chest. His pyrexia subsiding in a day or so. There were rhonchi in the chest and he was treated with antibiotics. As he failed to respond and indeed seemed to be getting worse, he was transferred to the local hospital where an X-ray revealed cardiac enlargement suggestive of pericardial effusion. On the 9/3/64 he was transferred to g Llandudno where the diagnosis of coronary infarction was made—"recent extensive antero-septal infarct". I feel that [the appellant] has had a true silent coronary occlusion and that this took place on 27/2/64, the subsequent events being due to the gradual cardiac failure. These events seem to have been initiated by his manual efforts on that day ...'

h The consultant physician connected with the hospital wrote (on 10th July 1964) as follows:

i '[The appellant] was transferred from the Hospital at Blaenau Ffestiniog on 9.3.64. His main complaints were of shortness of breath and rise of temperature, with chest pain. The chest pain started five days before admission, when he had sudden onset of pain over the left lateral and lower part of the chest; dyspnoea was also present. On admission he was orthopnoeic; pulse 104, B.P. 130/100. Rhonchi were present over both lungs; heart sounds were faint. Jugular venous pressure was raised. Electrocardiogram showed auricular fibrillation and recent extensive antero-septal myocardial infarct. It would appear that the myocardial infarct had been dated five days prior to admission, there being no previous history to suggest that he, in fact, had had cardiac pain in the past.

Other enquiries were made. They related to the question whether the work being done by the appellant on 27th February was out of proportion to his normal work and whether it was heavy work.

In my view, it is clear that the insurance officer was considering whether the appellant had suffered personal injury caused by accident; the very essence of his enquiry concerned the question whether the appellant's myocardial infarction was caused by accident on 27th February. There was no doubt that the appellant had suffered myocardial infarction but did it result from his work? If it did, as the appellant's doctor thought, then there was personal injury caused by accident. If it did not then there was no accident and no claim of any sort (under the Act of 1946) could be made.

The insurance officer took some time to reach decision. No complaint can be made of this. Evidence had to be obtained and enquiries made and the issue was one of importance. The decision came (on 24th August) nearly six months after 27th February. It was that: 'There was not an industrial accident because the appellant did not suffer personal injury by accident.' So industrial injury benefit was not payable.

The appellant appealed to a local appeal tribunal. From the records it is shown why the insurance officer had come to his conclusion. His submission was contained in the papers which were before the tribunal. He recorded that he recognised that although medical certificates had shown incapacity as being due to 'strained back' it had appeared from the medical evidence 'that incapacity since 27.2.64' had been due to myocardial infarction—a heart condition. That condition, he recorded, had however been the subject of a number of decisions by the commissioner in which medical evidence had been accepted to the effect that physical effort, however strenuous, does not play any part in causing coronary occlusion by thrombosis but that if the physical effort is, for the person concerned, something quite out of the ordinary and if occlusion occurs at the time or shortly after (at most not more than 24 hours after) the physical effort then it may play a part in precipitating the onset. As the insurance officer had thought that the work done by the appellant did not for him involve physical effort out of the ordinary, on which matter he thought that the whole case rested, he had decided that there was no personal injury suffered by accident.

The local appeal tribunal sat with a medical assessor. They reached decision on 6th November 1964. There were certain questions of fact which were material to their decision. In particular was the question as to the nature of the work that the appellant had been doing on 27th February, for it is plain that the insurance officer would have decided the other way if he had thought that the appellant's work on 27th February had for him involved physical effort out of the ordinary. The appeal tribunal allowed the appeal. It follows that they decided that the appellant did, on 27th February, suffer the personal injury of cardiac infarction by accident. The grounds of their decision were specific and clear:

'Satisfied that appellant had no previous history of cardiac infarction and that the symptoms noted shortly after the accident were in fact those of Infarction though not then recognised as such, also that the work he was engaged on at the time was exceptionally heavy for him as a fitter.'

It is difficult to imagine any more positive decision. The insurance officer did not seek to appeal from it. For the period during which, as a result of the injury, the appellant was incapable of work (see s 7 (1) (a)) injury benefit became payable to him.

The way seemed entirely clear to present a claim for disablement benefit. As it had been established that the appellant had suffered personal injury by accident, disablement benefit became 'payable' to him (see s 7 (1) (b)) if (at a time not within the injury a benefit period) he suffered as the result of the injury from loss of physical or mental faculty. Section 12 (in the form in which it was at the relevant time) deals further with entitlement to disablement benefit. The insured person must as a result of the relevant accident (which means the accident in respect of which the benefit is claimed or 'payable') be suffering from loss of physical or mental faculty to the extent laid down by the section. If he is, then the extent of disablement must be assessed in accordance with the general principles laid down in s 12 (2). The disabilities whose b extent are to be assessed are the disabilities incurred as a result of the relevant loss of faculty which by definition (see s 88) means the loss of faculty resulting from the relevant injury which by definition means the injury in respect of which the disablement benefit is claimed. It is clear from what I have set out above that the appellant had a finding in his favour from the local appeal tribunal that in the course of his work he

c had sustained myocardial infarction. That was the relevant injury. That was the relevant accident. That was the relevant injury in respect of which he claimed. That was the relevant accident in respect of which he claimed. Two disablement questions then arose: (1) Had the relevant accident resulted in a loss of faculty? (2) If so, what was the extent of the resulting disablement and at what degree should it be assessed and what period should be taken into account?

d In dealing with those questions it seems to me that the medical board made an entirely unwarranted approach. Being invited to enquire, and being limited to enquire, whether the relevant accident (which was the accident in respect of which he claimed and which was the accident as found by the only body charged with the duty of deciding what the accident was) had resulted in a loss of faculty, they proceeded to enquire into a matter which was not within their sphere or compartment. Being e told that the accident and also the injury consisted in sustaining myocardial infarction and being asked to say whether loss of faculty resulted, they said that myocardial infarction was unconnected with the accident. They were asked as medical men to say whether there was a loss of faculty from the myocardial infarction. They might have found that the trouble was all healed so that there was no loss of faculty. They did not find that. It was for them to consider the then effects of the injury by accident.
f What they said was that there was myocardial infarction but that it was unconnected with the accident. On the facts in this case that was a contradiction in terms. Myocardial infarction could not be unconnected with the relevant accident (and relevant injury) which had been found to be that of sustaining myocardial infarction. It may be that as medical men they disagreed with the medical evidence which had been considered by the local appeal tribunal. It may be that they thought that had there been an appeal from the local appeal tribunal the appeal might have succeeded.
g But it was not for them to constitute themselves as in effect an appeal body from the local appeal tribunal. All they did was to say that there was a loss of faculty which would handicap the appellant because there was some pain in the chest resulting from his having strained his chest. Their error of approach was fundamental. They should have recorded a conclusion whether the myocardial infarction had resulted in a loss of faculty and should then have proceeded to assess the extent of the resulting
h disablement and its degree and duration. Such extent had to be assessed, pursuant to the provisions of s 12 (2), by reference to the disabilities incurred by the appellant as a result of the relevant loss of faculty—which in this case meant, by definition, the loss resulting from the injury of myocardial infarction which was the injury in respect of which disablement benefit both was claimed and was under the express terms of s 7 (1) (b) payable. In assessing that extent all disabilities to which the appellant might j be expected to be subject had first to be considered (see s 12 (2) (a)) and those disabilities were to be treated as incurred as a result of the myocardial infarction unless the appellant would in any case have been subject to those disabilities as the result of a congenital defect or of some injury or disease received or contracted before he sustained myocardial infarction (the relevant accident) or would not have been subject to those disabilities but for some injury or disease received or contracted after and not directly attributable to sustaining myocardial infarction (see s 12 (2) (b)). It will be seen that none of the provisions of s 12 (2) justifies the course followed by the medical board.

On appeal to the medical appeal tribunal the fundamental error of approach of the medical board was not corrected but was repeated and adopted. The medical appeal tribunal were 'not satisfied that upon the balance of probabilities the relevant accident played any part, either by cause or contribution, in the infarction'. Again, on appeal to the commissioner the error of approach was not corrected. The contention of counsel for the appellant was that as the local appeal tribunal had quite plainly decided that the myocardial infarction was a personal injury caused by accident the occurrence of the myocardial infarction was the relevant accident. That contention was rejected. For the reasons which I have given I consider that it should have been accepted. I consider, therefore, in agreement with the judgment of Edmund Davies LJ, that in the appellant Jones's case¹⁵ an order of certiorari to quash the decision of the commissioner should have been made and I would allow the appeal accordingly.

I pass to consider the appellant Hudson's case. This case is governed by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1965, but as that is a consolidation Act I need not refer to its separate sections and I need not repeat what I have set out above. On 19th January 1965 the appellant Hudson was installing by hand a heavy piece of electronic machinery. He felt a sudden pain in the right loin and went to the first aid station. The same evening (some seven hours later) he sustained a sudden pain in the chest. He was admitted to hospital on 20th January. His doctor signed a medical certificate, that he was incapable of work by reason of 'Chest pain. N.Y.D.'—the letters signifying 'not yet diagnosed'. He did not at that time claim injury benefit but he claimed sickness benefit which benefit he in fact received for the period between 19th January to 17th April. He remained in hospital from 20th January to 12th February. He was certified as fit to resume work on 17th April. There were various medical certificates from time to time: early ones described his incapacity for work as due to 'myocardial infarct' and later ones as due to 'coronary thrombosis'. On 20th September 1965 he made an application for a declaration that his accident was an industrial accident (see s 49 of the Act of 1946). On his form of application he said that the injury that he had suffered was 'Hernia'. On 4th October the insurance officer decided that the accident sustained on 19th January was an industrial accident and a declaration to that effect was recorded. Then on 3rd November the appellant Hudson claimed disablement benefit. He stated on his form of claim that the way in which he was disabled as a result of the accident was that he 'suffered Hernia'. He went before a medical board by whom he was examined and to whom he stated that while lifting electronic equipment on 19th January he strained himself on the right side and that the same evening he had a heart attack. The board found, on 20th December 1965, that the appellant Hudson had a right inguinal hernia and 'myocardial infarction January 65'. They, however, recorded the latter as an 'unconnected condition'. They found that there was a loss of faculty and assessed disability by reference to the hernia. The board were evidently concerned about the heart condition. They recorded that they had discussed the case 'as his heart attack occurred the day of the rupture when he had been subjected to considerable strain which might also be the cause of the heart lesion'. They proceeded to state 'but this is made unconnected as no claim has been made'. I think that this clearly means that they thought that it was quite likely that the heart lesion was the result of the strain but that they had put down the myocardial infarction as being an 'unconnected condition' merely because the appellant Hudson himself had in his claim only asserted that his disablement as a result of accident was that he had suffered hernia. I agree with Lord Parker CJ when he said on this point that¹⁶—

- a 'the medical board never decided the point at all, they merely said that it was unconnected as it had not been made the subject of a claim, in other words they had not decided the matter on the merits one way or the other.'

Appeal was then sought (by letter dated 14th June 1966) from the decision of the medical board. One ground of appeal was based on the failure of the medical board to take the heart condition into account. Then a claim on behalf of the appellant was made (by a letter of 13th July) that for the period of incapacity, from 19th January to 17th April 1965, he should receive injury benefit. As noted above he had only received sickness benefit. Certain letters containing reports from medical men were submitted in support. In one of these, that of Dr Somerville, the view was expressed that there was a direct causal relationship between the development of the coronary thrombosis and the physical effort of the appellant earlier on 19th January 1965.

- c The further view was expressed that because of a condition of arteriosclerosis it was possible or likely that the appellant would have developed coronary thrombosis some time in the future but that conversely if, on the day in question, he had not been engaged in the type of work severe enough to produce an inguinal hernia the thrombosis would almost certainly not have occurred on that day and possibly might never have occurred.

- d The claim for injury benefit was accordingly considered by the local insurance officer who had before him the medical reports then submitted as well as the declaration of liability and the findings of the medical board. The local insurance officer did not give any separate or specific decision but he decided to award injury benefit for the period from 19th January 1965 to 17th April 1965, and payment was authorised. Injury benefit could of course only have been awarded if there was personal injury

- e caused by accident and if the appellant was 'as the result of the injury' incapable of work. On what basis, then, was the insurance officer awarding injury benefit? If the medical board had, as Lord Parker CJ held¹⁷ (as I think rightly), dealt only with the hernia and had come to no conclusion in regard to the heart condition then it was fully open to the local insurance officer to decide that the heart condition was part of the injury by accident sustained by the appellant. Injury benefit being only payable

- f if as a result of the injury there was incapacity for work it could not have been awarded for the whole period (to 17th April 1965) on the basis of the hernia alone if the hernia by itself did not incapacitate for the whole of that time. It appears that the award of the local insurance officer was made on the basis of the heart condition. That was the conclusion of Lord Parker CJ, who said¹⁸ that the decision of the local insurance officer was that the appellant was totally incapacitated in the period from 19th January

- g to 17th April 1965 by reason of the heart condition. That that was the basis of the decision of the insurance officer is confirmed by the fact that in a subsequent application to the commissioner, to which I must later refer, the view presented to the commissioner on behalf of the Ministry was that it was a reasonable inference that the award of the insurance officer was made in respect of myocardial infarction.

- h The sequence of the events in the appellant Hudson's case did not follow the normal pattern. Some of the complications might have been avoided if the medical reports which were submitted to the insurance officer had been earlier obtained and if there had been a claim for injury benefit before there was a claim for industrial benefit and before the submission (in a restricted form) to a medical board. But the appellant should not suffer, provided that his claims are valid, merely because the course of the proceedings was out of the ordinary making a close examination necessary.

- j The next stage was that the appeal of the claimant came on before the medical appeal tribunal. The appeal tribunal may not have been fully made aware of the position. In one of the documents is set out what the Minister wished the tribunal to consider:

18 [1969] 2 All ER at 632, [1970] 1 QB at 480

'The Minister asks the Tribunal to consider whether "myocardial infarction" is fully relevant to the accident and if so to make an appropriate assessment from 20.4.65.'

But that was not at that juncture the question which they should have been asked. They should have been told that after the matter had been before the medical board who had had only a restricted claim before them there had been the decision of the local appeal officer on the question which was within his sphere, i.e. the question as to what was the injury by accident. As set out above his award of injury benefit was on the basis that myocardial infarction was part of the injury by accident. Doubtless because of the way in which they had been invited to consider the matter the appeal tribunal stated in their decision that the substantial question was whether the heart condition was attributable to the accident. That was an error. Their task was not to determine what was the relevant accident but to consider whether the relevant accident resulted in a loss of faculty with resultant disability. They expressed the view that 'exertion being by itself no precipitating factor in myocardial infarction' they found nothing in the case 'to associate that condition with the relevant accident'. The assessment of disability was therefore confirmed on the basis of the hernia alone. Their decision ran counter to that of the insurance officer who had decided that myocardial infarction was a part of the relevant injury and relevant accident. So the error of approach as shown in the appellant Jones's case was here also revealed. It was not corrected in the decision of the commissioner who, in refusing leave to appeal, held that though the first decision of the insurance officer made the finding in regard to hernia final for all purposes the second decision of the insurance officer was not binding on the medical authorities. I think that this was erroneous. It may have been based on the view of the commissioner that the medical board had 'decided' that the myocardial infarction was in fact an unconnected condition whereas, as I have set out above, the medical board did not decide that matter one way or the other.

For the reasons that I have given I consider that in this case also there was error of law in the determination of the commissioner with the result that the appeal should be allowed.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, to succeed in these appeals the appellants have to show that the commissioners, who rejected their appeals from medical appeal tribunals, erred in law. Whether or not they did so depends, in the appellant Jones's case, on the construction to be placed on and the effect of provisions of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946, as amended by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1953, and, in the case of the appellant Hudson, of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1965; and in relation to both appeals the decision of this House in *Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union (Re Dowling)*¹⁹ has to be considered. The respondent challenges the correctness of that decision and contends that it should not be followed. He also submits that if that, their primary contention, fails, the Divisional Court²⁰ and the Court of Appeal¹ were right in distinguishing that decision from the cases now under appeal.

The 1946 Act repealed the Workmen's Compensation Acts and instituted a system of insurance in their place. That Act was amended by the 1953 Act and both those Acts have now been replaced by the 1965 Act, a consolidation Act. Although in the process of consolidation the order of some of the sections has been changed, some subsections converted into sections and some changes of language made, the main structure of the scheme instituted by the 1946 Act remains unchanged and the effect of the provisions of the 1946 Act as amended by the 1953 Act remains unaltered and is the same as that of the corresponding provisions of the 1965 Act so far as these appeals a are concerned. I propose, therefore, to consider the terms of the 1946 Act as amended by the 1953 Act.

By the 1946 Act provision was made for the payment of three kinds of benefit, injury benefit, disablement benefit and death benefit. None of these benefits is payable unless the insured person suffered injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment (s 7 (1); 1965 s 5 (1)). Where a person suffers an injury caused by such an accident, even though he does not claim any benefit or has failed to establish a claim to benefit, he may be entitled to a declaration that the accident was an industrial accident (s 49; 1965 s 48).

Injury benefit is only payable if the injury causes incapacity for work and during the incapacity. It cannot, however, be paid for more than 156 days (excluding Sundays) commencing with the day of the accident even though the incapacity lasts beyond that period. Disablement benefit is only payable if, as a result of the injury, the insured person has suffered a loss of physical or mental faculty causing a disability which, when assessed in accordance with the Act, amounts to one per cent or more. It may be payable throughout a person's life if the disability lasts so long and payment of it does not depend on whether a person has been rendered incapable of work. If it has made him unemployable and he is likely to remain incapable of work permanently, he can receive 'unemployability supplement' in addition to his disablement benefit (s 13 (1); 1965 s 13 (1)). An insured person cannot, however, be in receipt of injury benefit and disablement benefit at the same time. He may be entitled to disablement benefit although not entitled to injury benefit but he cannot, if he is receiving injury benefit, obtain payment of disablement benefit until payment of injury benefit has ceased. Death benefit is payable in certain circumstances to a widow or widower (ss 19, 20; 1965 ss 19, 20) to a person who has a family which includes a child or children of the deceased (s 21; 1965 s 21), to the deceased's parents (s 22; 1965 s 22), to relatives (s 23; 1965 s 23) and to women having the care of the deceased's children (s 24; 1965 s 24).

These are the basic features of the insurance scheme. A separate claim has to be made for the benefit sought and all claims for benefit have to be submitted in the first place to an insurance officer, but different procedures have to be followed in relation to a claim for disablement benefit from those followed where the claim is for injury benefit. Claims for injury benefit and questions arising in connection therewith are, if they are not 'special questions', dealt with by an insurance officer. He can allow such a claim in whole or in part, or reject it or refer it to a local appeal tribunal for decision, but he can only do so if he is of the opinion that no 'special question' arises. If he thinks that one does, he must refer it to the person or body prescribed by the Act for determination.

Claims for disablement benefit involve the determination of 'special questions', namely, whether the relevant accident has resulted in a loss of faculty, and whether the ensuing disability is to be assessed at one per cent or more. They, and the question what period is to be taken into account by the assessment, have to be determined by a medical board or medical appeal tribunal constituted under the Act (s 36 (1) (c); 1965 s 37). They cannot be decided by an insurance officer or local appeal tribunal or by the industrial injuries commissioner.

All other questions arising in relation to a claim for disablement benefit have to be decided by an insurance officer or, if referred by him to a local appeal tribunal, by that tribunal in the first instance. An appeal lies from a decision of an insurance officer to a local appeal tribunal and from a local appeal tribunal to the commissioner (hereafter for convenience, referred to as 'the statutory authorities'). The appeal to the commissioner is not limited to a point of law.

An appeal lies from a decision of a medical board to a medical appeal tribunal, and from a medical appeal tribunal to the commissioner only on a point of law. For convenience I will hereafter refer to a medical board and a medical appeal tribunal as 'the medical authorities', although they are, of course, just as much creatures of statute as the statutory authorities, and despite the fact that medical questions which arise on claims for injury benefit are decided not by them but by the statutory authorities. The Act makes provision for the review of decisions of medical and statutory authorities and there is a wider power of review of the decisions of the latter than of the former (ss 40 (1), 50 (1); 1965 ss 40 (1), 49 (1)). Whether there was an accident and whether it caused personal injury are questions which have to be decided by the statutory authorities both when the claim is for disablement benefit and when it is for injury benefit.

It was argued for the appellants that a decision by the statutory authorities on a claim for injury benefit that the accident had caused a particular injury was binding on the medical authorities in relation to a claim for disablement benefit. If they found that there was a loss of faculty causing one per cent or more disability due to an injury suffered by the claimant, they were bound, it was said, to hold that that injury was caused by the accident, if prior to their consideration of the matter the statutory authorities had held that it was, even though in their opinion that was clearly not the case. Equally, if the statutory authorities decided, before the medical authorities considered the matter, that the accident had not caused the alleged injury, disablement benefit could not be awarded even though the medical authorities were firmly of opinion that there was such a loss of faculty due to the injury and that the injury was caused by the accident.

Counsel for the appellant Hudson conceded that the converse must equally be true, that if the medical authorities decided that an injury was or was not due to the accident in the course of determining whether there was any loss of faculty due to the relevant accident, and did so before the statutory authorities had to consider that question in relation to a claim for injury benefit, the decision of the medical authorities in relation to a claim for disablement benefit would be binding on the statutory authorities in relation to the claim for injury benefit. So, if the medical authorities held that the accident had not caused the injury, the statutory authorities would be precluded from awarding injury benefit even if they were satisfied that the accident had caused the injury and had caused incapacity for work.

I think it inherently improbable that Parliament, when devising the system for the administration of the scheme, intended that a claim for injury benefit might be affected by a decision on a disablement benefit claim or vice versa and that the right to a benefit might depend on whether the statutory authorities or the medical authorities 'got in first'. While it is true that claims for injury benefit and for disablement benefit arise from an accident causing injury, the system devised and embodied in the Act in my opinion provides that such claims should from their inception be dealt with differently and separately.

Further, if the argument advanced is valid, it leads to some curious results. Where there had been a prior decision by the statutory authorities, it would mean that the medical authorities were precluded from discharging the duty imposed on them by the Act of determining whether there was a loss of faculty due to the relevant accident. If the statutory authorities had held that the injury was not caused by accident, they would be bound to say that there was no loss of faculty due to the accident without themselves having given any consideration to that question. If the statutory authorities held that the injury was due to the accident, they would only be able to decide whether it caused a loss of faculty. In neither case would they be deciding the question which the statute says they are to decide. In the first case, the decision would be that of the statutory authorities and in the second a decision on only part of the question entrusted to them. If Parliament had intended their function to be so limited, that could easily have been made plain in the Act, but I can find no indication of any such intention.

If this argument is right, it would also, I think, mean that a local appeal tribunal and a medical appeal tribunal might be inhibited in the discharge of their appellate functions. If an insurance officer decides that an injury is not due to the accident, that decision, it is said, is binding on the medical board which consequently has to hold that a the injury was not caused by accident. If an appeal from the insurance officer comes before the local appeal tribunal after the medical board's decision, the local appeal board will, if the argument prevails, have to follow the decision of the medical board. If thereafter an appeal from the medical board is heard by a medical appeal tribunal, that tribunal could not allow the appeal as it would be bound by the decision of the local appeal tribunal. If there was then an appeal from the local appeal tribunal to the commissioner, he too could not allow the appeal for he would be bound by the decision of the medical appeal tribunal. So, if the course of dealing with the claims followed this sequence, as they might, the appeal provisions in the Act would be rendered nugatory and there would in reality be no effective appeal from the original decision of the insurance officer. This cannot have been the intention of Parliament.

c In support of their contention the appellants relied on *Re Dowling*² and it is convenient to consider that case now. Dowling felt an acute pain in his chest when he was lifting a heavy granite flagstone in the course of his employment. A small hiatus hernia was diagnosed. An insurance officer rejected his claim for injury benefit. His decision was upheld by the local appeal tribunal but the commissioner (H I Nelson Esq QC) on appeal held that the hernia was traumatic in origin and consequently that Dowling was entitled to injury benefit. Thereafter Dowling claimed disablement benefit. The medical board rejected his claim holding that the hernia was not caused by the accident. The medical appeal tribunal dismissed his appeal. On appeal to the commissioner on a point of law, he held that there had been no error in law and so dismissed the appeal.

e The question to be decided in this House was whether the decision of the commissioner in relation to the claim for injury benefit that the hernia was caused by the accident was binding on the medical authorities. If it was, all they were entitled to consider was whether a loss of faculty had resulted from the hernia and, if so, the degree of disability caused thereby. The same question would have arisen if the insurance officer had held that the hernia was caused by the accident. My noble and learned friends, Lord Reid and Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, Lord Hodson and Lord Guest held that the decision on the injury benefit claim that the hernia was caused by the accident was binding on the medical authorities. My noble and learned friends, Lord Reid and Lord Guest agreed with the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Hodson. Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest reached his conclusion on different grounds. My noble and learned friend, Lord Hodson, said³:

g 'In the ordinary case where accident and injury are separate, there is no difficulty, but here the accident and the injury are the same. There would be no accident but for the injury. The problem in this case is to determine whether the decision of Mr. Commissioner NELSON stands, or whether it is cancelled by the subsequent decision of the medical tribunal. In my judgment, the "question" which the commissioner had to decide was one arising in connexion with a claim for benefit within the language of s. 36 (2) of the Act. In order to ascertain whether there was an accident, he had to resolve the conflict of medical testimony and, in doing so, he was acting within his jurisdiction. His decision is, accordingly, final according to the terms of s. 36 (3) of the Act . . . which provides: "Except as provided by this Part of this Act . . . any decision of a claim or question as provided by the foregoing provisions of this section shall be final." There is no reason to limit the meaning of the word "final", as the Minister seeks to do, to the particular claim which is being dealt with. The claims for injury and disablement benefit are linked together and in the normal case they follow one another.'

I regret that I cannot agree with this. I do not think that it is correct to say that claims for injury benefit and for disablement benefit are linked together. While it is true that each claim must be based on an accident causing injury, apart from that different questions have to be decided in relation to each claim and by different bodies and a separate claim must be made for each benefit. a

While I do not seek to restrict the meaning of the word 'final', I cannot agree that in this Act it has the meaning given to it by my noble and learned friend. To say that a decision is final means that the decision cannot be altered and that there can be no further appeal from it. Section 36 (3) provides that decisions to which that subsection applies cannot be altered save as provided by the Act. It does not mean that a decision on a claim for one kind of benefit or on a question arising in connection therewith is binding and conclusive in relation to a claim for another kind of benefit or on a question arising in connection therewith. The words 'conclusive' and 'final' appear in a number of places in the Act and it is not, I think, conceivable that Parliament and the draftsman intended them to have the same meaning. Indeed, consideration of the sections in which the words appear show that in the Act the word 'final' is used in the sense I have stated and that where it is intended that a decision shall be binding in other proceedings the word 'conclusive' is used. b

Section 37 (5) states that the 'decision of the High Court on a reference or appeal under this section shall be final'. There the word 'final' means that there can be no appeal from that decision and that that decision is unalterable: s 49 (4) (1965 s 48 (4)) provides that a declaration that an accident was or was not an industrial accident is 'conclusive for the purposes of any claim for benefit in respect of that accident'. Section 72 (1965 s 70) contains both words. Section 72 (1) provides that in any proceedings (a) for an offence under the Act; or (b) involving any question as to the payment of contributions under the Act; or (c) for the recovery of any sums due to the Industrial Injuries Fund, the decision of the Minister on any 'special question' which has to be determined by him, subject to an appeal to the High Court on a question of law, shall, unless such an appeal is pending or the time for appealing has not expired, 'be conclusive for the purpose of those proceedings'. Section 72 (2) also provides that decisions on certain other questions are to be 'conclusive for the purpose of those proceedings' unless the question has been referred or the time for referring it has not run out, or a case has been stated or the time for applying for one to be stated has not expired. And s 72 (4) provides that where an appeal is pending or any application for a reference or for a case to be stated has been made or the time for appealing or for making such an application has not expired, the court dealing with the case 'shall adjourn the proceedings until such time as a final decision on the question has been obtained'. Again here 'final' must mean an unalterable and unappealable decision. c

I do not think that it is right to interpret the word 'final' in s 36 (3) as meaning 'conclusive for the purposes of any claim for benefit', the words used in s 49, and it appears to me that my noble and learned friend, Lord Hodson⁴, has given the word 'final' that meaning. If that had been the intended meaning, I would have expected the word used in s 36 (3) not to be 'final' but to find in the subsection words similar to those used in s 49. d

I find support for my view on this in the decision of this House in *Inland Revenue Comrs v Brooks*⁵, which was not cited in *Re Dowling*⁶. There the question was what meaning was to be given to the word 'final' in s 57 (10) of the Taxes Management Act 1880, which stated: e

'Appeals once determined by the General Commissioners . . . shall be final; and neither the determination of the Commissioners nor the assessment then and there made thereupon shall be altered at any subsequent meeting, or at any other time or place, except by order of the High Court when a case has been required as provided by this Act.'

a Mr Brooks's income for income tax purposes had been determined by the General Commissioners. The Special Commissioners were required to determine his income for the same period for the purposes of super-tax. The Revenue contended that the Special Commissioners were bound by the General Commissioners' determination. It was held that they were not. Earl Loreburn said in reference to s 57 (10)⁷:

b 'It does not say that the determination is to be final for all purposes. When, therefore, another tax is imposed by another statute, whether it be a duty of income tax or not, and a different tribunal is directed to estimate the same figure as part of a greater whole, I do not read the section as imposing upon the new tribunal a duty to accept the determination of the old.'

And Lord Atkinson said⁸:

c 'In my view . . . the provisions as to the finality of the determination of the Commissioners for General Purposes . . . do not mean that the determinations . . . are to be final and conclusive, not only in the particular matter on which they were actually pronounced, but in all other matters and for all other purposes. Mr Ryde, for the respondent, but it correctly, I think, in saying that the s 57, sub-s. 10, simply means that there shall be no further proceedings before the Commissioners in the particular matter of dispute or inquiry which is the subject of the appeal.'

Section 36 (3) provides that except as provided 'any decision of a claim or question as provided by the foregoing provisions of this section shall be final'. The questions as provided by the foregoing provisions of the section are special questions and 'any question arising in connection with a claim for or award of benefit' (s 36 (2)). The 1965 Act, by s 50 (1), altered the language. It provides that except as provided by this Part of this Act any decision of a claim or question 'in accordance with this Part of this Act shall be final'. As the 1965 Act was a consolidation Act, this change of language does not, in my opinion, involve a change of meaning.

Much argument was directed to the meaning of the words 'any question arising in connection with a claim'. I do not think that they cover all incidental questions that have to be decided, for s 46 (2) (1965 s 45 (2)) distinguishes between decisions of a local appeal tribunal and the findings of fact material to a decision and s 36 (3) only applies to 'any decision of a claim or question'.

Power is given by s 51 (1965 s 50) to make regulations for prescribing the evidence to be required in connection with the determination of a claim or a question arising in connection therewith. It is unlikely that the power would be taken to make such regulations in respect of findings of fact and so this regulation-making power gives some support to the view that the words in question did not cover findings of fact material to a decision.

Section 45 (1) (1965 s 44 (2)) inter alia provides that all questions arising in connection with a claim for benefit must be submitted in the first instance to an insurance officer but this does not, I think, mean that the words are only intended to cover questions arising independently of a claim. That would give to the words too limited a meaning. I think that the words were intended to mean questions arising under the Act in connection with a claim and that they do not cover questions that have to be decided in order to determine a question which arises under the Act.

A decision that there was an accident which caused injury is, in my view, a decision on a question arising under the Act in connection with a claim and so final, save as provided by the Act, for the purposes of the claim. If the only injury alleged is hernia, then a decision that the accident caused injury is a decision that the accident caused the hernia and that is final save as provided by the Act. But as I have said, in my opinion it is final for the purposes of that claim and not conclusive in relation to a different claim.

I agree that Mr Commissioner Nelson had to resolve a conflict of medical testimony and that it was within his jurisdiction to do so, but I do not agree that the question for decision in the Dowling case⁹ was whether his decision was cancelled by the decision of the medical appeal tribunal. There is no appeal to that tribunal from his decision, which was final for the purposes of the injury benefit claim. No decision by the medical appeal tribunal could cancel his decision. The question is, not whether his decision was cancelled but whether his decision restricted that tribunal in the discharge of its statutory duty. I do not think it did.

I also do not agree that in the Dowling case⁹ the accident and the injury were the same. While it is true that there would have been no accident but for the injury, it does not appear to me to follow that the accident and the injury were the same. The words 'injury caused by accident' are no doubt derived from the Workmen's Compensation Acts. In those Acts and in these Acts 'accident' is treated as something distinct and separate from 'injury', and unless the accident caused injury there could be no claim for compensation under those Acts nor can there be for benefit under these. 'Accident' is not defined. I think it simply means the event or happening which caused the injury, in other words the cause of the injury. In Dowling's case⁹ the event or happening was the lifting of a heavy flagstone and the question which had to be determined in respect of both claims was whether that had caused the hernia. To say that the hernia, the injury, was the accident does not appear to me correct.

My noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, did not found his opinion at all on s 36 (3) and the meaning to be given to the word 'final'. He agreed that the decision on the injury benefit claim that the hernia was caused by accident was binding on the medical authorities when they considered the disablement questions and did so on two distinct grounds, each of which differed from those stated by my noble and learned friend, Lord Hodson. Lord Morris regarded the case as exceptional¹⁰ 'because a decision as to what caused the injury complained of also resolved the question whether there was an accident at all' and said¹¹ that, until there had been a determination that there had been an accident, a medical board would not be called upon.

He held that¹² 'A medical board could not reverse a determination which was a prerequisite to their being convened' and thought that the case could be decided on this ground alone. He went on to say¹³:

'Whether he does so suffer a loss of faculty "as the result of the injury" will be a question for determination by a medical board; but, in my view, the statutory language shows that they are only concerned with questions whether loss of faculty is the result of injury. They start with the premise that there has been injury caused by accident. They cannot say that there has been no injury. That will have been determined before they are invited to act.'

Both Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest and Lord Hodson appear to have regarded the facts in Dowling's case⁹ as exceptional. The present appeals show that they may not have been so exceptional and, indeed, there may be a considerable number of cases in which the facts are very similar.

In the majority of cases, no doubt, a claim for injury benefit is made and determined before a claim for disablement benefit is decided, but the appellant Hudson's case shows that that is not always the case and that the decision of a medical board on a disablement benefit claim may precede the determination of an injury benefit claim.

a Both the grounds stated by my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, appear to me to depend on his conclusion that there must have been a determination that injury was caused by accident before the disablement questions come before a medical board. I cannot myself find any indication in the Act that this must be so although I recognise that it might happen. If it is so decided on an injury benefit claim, that will not, for the reasons I have given, be a final conclusion in relation to the disablement benefit claim.

b It is true that an insurance officer dealing with a disablement benefit claim can decide that the accident caused a particular injury. If he did so before the disablement questions were decided by a medical board, his decision would be final by virtue of s 36 (3) and binding on them. Where there is doubt whether the injury resulted from the accident, it is, as I read the Act, open to the insurance officer to defer a decision until after the decision of the disablement questions.

c Section 48 (1) (1965 s 47 (1)) provides that if on consideration of a claim or question the insurance officer is of opinion that a special question arises, he shall refer it for determination as required by the Act and deal with any other questions as if the special question had not arisen. Disablement questions, that is to say, the questions whether there has been a loss of faculty due to the relevant accident and, if so, the extent of the resulting disability, are special questions which he must refer to a medical board. This section does not require him, nor is there any provision in the Act which requires him, to decide whether or not there has been an accident causing injury before he refers the special questions to the medical board and before those questions are decided. If that was the intention of Parliament, one would expect to find some provision to that effect. The fact that the Act does not so provide permits a measure, and I think a desirable measure, of flexibility in its administration.

d A number of questions have to be decided before an injury benefit claim or a disablement benefit claim is allowed. In relation to an injury benefit claim on which no special question arises, the insurance officer, or, if he refers it to them, the local appeal tribunal, has to decide before the claim is allowed that there has been an accident causing injury and that the injury caused incapacity for work. In some cases an insurance officer may reject a claim on the ground that there was no accident causing injury. In others he may conclude that even if there was such an accident, there was no incapacity for work and he may reject the claim on that ground without deciding whether there was an accident causing injury. The Act does not prescribe the order in which he has to decide these questions and I see nothing in the Act to prevent him from rejecting a claim on one ground without deciding the other questions which have to be decided before a claim is allowed.

e Similarly on disablement benefit claims the Act does not provide, as it could have done, that the questions which have to be resolved for a claim to be allowed have to be decided in any particular order. In the appellant Jones's case there was no decision on the disablement benefit claim whether the accident caused the injury before the matter was referred to the medical board. I am consequently unable to agree with my noble and learned friend that a medical board will not be called on until there has been a decision that there had been an accident causing injury and that such a board starts with the premise that there has been injury caused by accident. Nor am I able to agree that the statutory language shows that they are only concerned with whether loss of faculty is the result of the injury. The statutory language leads me to the contrary conclusion.

f Section 11 (1) provided for payment of injury benefit if 'as the result of the relevant injury' the claimant is incapable of work. Section 12 (1) of the Act similarly provided that the loss of faculty must be 'the result of the relevant injury' but s 36 (1) (c) defined the first of the two disablement questions to be decided by a medical board as 'whether the relevant accident' resulted in a loss of faculty. That discrepancy between s 12 (1) and s 36 (1) (c) was eliminated by the 1953 Act which amended s 12 (1) by the deletion of the word 'injury' and the insertion in its place of the word 'accident'.

So the 1946 Act as so amended and the 1965 Act provide that the relevant accident, not the relevant injury, must have resulted in a loss of faculty. If this change had not been made in 1953 the argument that all the medical authorities were required to do was to decide whether there was a loss of faculty due to the injury would have been more persuasive. Parliament must have changed the word deliberately and perhaps did so with a view to making it clear that such an argument was invalid. However this may be, both s 12 (1) as amended and s 36 (1) (c) require the medical authorities to decide whether the relevant accident caused a loss of faculty, and I cannot, therefore, agree that the statutory language shows that a medical board is only concerned with whether loss of faculty is the result of the injury. It is for these reasons that I feel compelled to dissent from the grounds put forward by my noble and learned friend for his conclusion.

I take *Re Dowling*¹⁴ to have decided that a decision by the statutory authorities which preceded a decision by the medical authorities, that the hernia was caused by accident, was binding on the medical authorities. I think that that decision was wrong and, unless these appeals can be distinguished from it, one must consider whether it should now be followed.

The appellant Jones claimed injury benefit on 27th February 1964, the same day as the accident, on the ground that he had hurt himself when lifting a piece of scrap metal. When in hospital he was found to be suffering from a myocardial infarction. The insurance officer rejected the claim while accepting that his incapacity since 27th February had been due to myocardial infarction. He did so on the ground that that condition had not been brought about by the work he had been doing. The local appeal tribunal allowed his appeal on 6th November 1964, holding that the infarction was due to the exceptionally heavy work he had been engaged on. On 25th November he claimed disablement benefit.

The report of the medical board contains his account of the accident. The board examined him and found that he was suffering from a 'strain chest' and a myocardial infarction. They held that the strain resulted from the accident but that the myocardial infarction did not. They assessed the disability due to the strain at 3 per cent. The medical appeal tribunal found no reason to disagree with the medical board and the commissioner on appeal to him held that the medical appeal tribunal had not erred in law.

If the decision of the statutory authorities was binding on the medical authorities, they had to accept that he had suffered the myocardial infarction as a result of an accident. They did not do so, but accepted that the strain had been caused by the accident. They thus did not negative the conclusion that on 27th February the appellant Jones had suffered personal injury by accident but they substituted another injury to that found by the statutory authorities to have been caused.

It was on the ground that their decision did not involve the conclusion that there had been no injury by accident on 27th February that the commissioner, the Divisional Court¹⁵ and the Court of Appeal¹⁶ distinguished this case from that of *Dowling*¹⁴.

If the medical board had not on 17th December found that the appellant Jones was suffering from a strain, the case would be indistinguishable from *Dowling*¹⁴; and if the medical authorities had regarded themselves as bound by *Dowling*¹⁴ they would have had to assess the degree of disability due to myocardial infarction although in their opinion that did not result from the accident. If, however, the distinction drawn between this case and *Dowling*¹⁴ is valid, they can avoid doing so, if on examination of the claimant they are able to discover another distinct injury. This is bound, if right, to lead to anomalies, to one man getting disability benefit for a loss of faculty which in the opinion of the medical authorities did not result from the accident if on examination he was not found to be suffering from some other injury due to the accident, and to another man not getting disablement benefit for the same loss a of faculty if the medical authorities found him to be suffering from some other injury due to the accident. Such a result cannot, I think, have been contemplated by Parliament.

In my view, the distinction drawn is invalid. The injury found by the local appeal tribunal to have been caused was myocardial infarction. If, in consequence of *Re Dowling*¹⁷, that conclusion is binding on the medical authorities, they must accept b that myocardial infarction was caused by the accident and cannot avoid doing so by finding that the accident caused another injury. So, in my opinion, if *Re Dowling*¹⁷ stands, the appeal by the appellant Jones must be allowed.

The facts of the appellant Hudson's case are more complicated. On 19th January 1965 he hurt himself while lifting a heavy weight. He did not then claim injury benefit but on 20th September 1965 he applied for a declaration that he had suffered c an industrial accident on 19th January. In his application he was required to state what injury he had suffered. He stated that it was a hernia. His employers were required to complete a form which included the question, 'Are you satisfied that an accident occurred at the time, date and place stated?' To that the answer was 'Yes'. It also contained the question 'What injuries were observed or reported?' To that the answer was 'Suspected hernia'. The form sent to the employers was then stamped d with a rubber stamp which stated that the accident was an industrial accident. Later, on 3rd November 1965, the appellant Hudson claimed disablement benefit, stating in answer to the question 'In what way are you disabled as a result of the accident?', 'Suffered hernia'.

On 20th December 1965 the medical board found that the hernia resulted from the accident. They also found him to be suffering from a myocardial infarction. e They treated that condition as unconnected with the accident as no claim had been made on that account although they said that the considerable strain to which he had been subjected 'might also be the cause of the heart lesion'. On 13th July 1966 he claimed injury benefit, and on 5th August that claim was allowed. It was stated by the Ministry that 'no separate decision was given by the insurance officer in this case' and consequently it is not known whether he decided that the appellant f Hudson's incapacity for work was due to the hernia, or to his heart condition or to both. He had a heart attack the day after the accident. The medical appeal tribunal on 27th September 1966, dismissed the appellant Hudson's appeal. They said that the 'substantial question' was 'whether or not the heart condition is attributable to the accident' and said:

'Exertion being of itself no precipitating factor in myocardial infarction, we g can find nothing in this case to associate that condition with the relevant accident.'

They assessed the degree of disability due to the hernia at 3 per cent.

On these facts the following questions arise for consideration: (1) what was the effect of the declaration that the accident was an industrial accident; (2) whether h the medical board decided that the myocardial infarction was unconnected with the accident; and (3), if so, is that decision to be treated as final in the sense of conclusive and so binding on the statutory authorities when they came to consider the claim for injury benefit?

The declaration was made under s 49 (1965 s 48) which provided by sub-s (5) that:

'... an accident whereby a person suffers personal injury shall be deemed j ... to be an industrial accident if—(a) it arises out of and in the course of his employment; (b) that employment is insurable employment; and (c) payment of benefit is not, under the provisions of Part II of this Act, precluded because the accident happened while he was outside Great Britain ...'

Such a declaration is, as I have said, conclusive for the purposes of any claim for benefit in respect of that accident (s 49 (4); 1965 s 48 (4)).

Of what is it conclusive? It must be conclusive on whether the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment, on whether that employment was insurable employment, and on whether payment of benefit is not precluded because the accident happened while he was outside Great Britain. If, it may be years after the event, he claims disablement benefit or death benefit is claimed, the claimant is relieved by the declaration from having to deal with these matters. Is it conclusive that there was an accident? I think the answer must be 'Yes' for there can be no point in making a declaration that an accident was an industrial accident if later it can be said that there was no accident at all. Is it conclusive as to the accident having caused injury? Again I think for the same reason, it must be. The vital question is, is it conclusive as to the nature of the injury caused?

Section 49 (1) provides that where in connection with a claim for benefit, it is determined that the relevant accident was or was not an industrial accident, an express declaration of that shall be made and recorded. This language strongly suggests that such a determination has not to be made on every claim for benefit but only on some claims, and on those in which some or all of the matters on which the declaration is to be conclusive are in issue. Section 49 (1) goes on to provide that a claimant shall be entitled to have the question whether the relevant accident was an industrial accident determined even if his claim is disallowed on other grounds, and s 49 (2) enables a person who has suffered a personal injury by accident to have it determined whether or not the accident was an industrial accident without making any claim for benefit.

In these three cases, *Re Dowling*¹⁸ and the present appeals it would appear that on the day of the accident all three claimants suffered some injury by accident while at work. They all hurt themselves when lifting a heavy weight. If an insurance officer was satisfied that that was the case he could have made a declaration that the accident was an industrial accident without reaching any conclusion as to the precise nature of the injury suffered as a result of the accident. On an injury benefit claim when such a declaration has been made, the statutory authorities have still to determine whether there was incapacity for work, its cause and whether that resulted from the accident. On a disablement benefit claim, the medical authorities are not relieved by the making of such a declaration from discharging the duty the Act places on them of deciding whether there was a loss of faculty due to the accident. For the Act does not provide that the making of such a declaration relieves the statutory and the medical authorities of the obligation to decide these questions. If that had been the intention of Parliament, one surely would find some indication of it in the Act and the absence of any such indication leads me to the conclusion that such a declaration is not conclusive as to the nature of the injury suffered although conclusive that there was some injury due to the accident, some injury, it may be, of so trivial a character as not to give rise immediately to a claim for injury or for disablement benefit.

While I recognise that s 49 does not fit in very well with other provisions of the Act and with its general structure, I cannot interpret a declaration made under it as being conclusive as to the nature of the injury caused by the accident when the section contains no indication that that is to be the case.

As to the second and third questions, I do not think that the medical board can be regarded as having decided that the myocardial infarction was unconnected with the accident despite the fact that in their report they stated that it was for they said that the strain to which he had been subjected might have caused the heart lesion. It is, I think, clear from their report that they only entered that condition as unconnected as the claim for benefit had not been based on it. If, however, they had decided that the infarction was unconnected with the accident, their decision would, in the light of *Re Dowling*¹⁸, have been binding on the statutory authorities who would then have had to reject the claim for injury benefit.

- a Taking the view I do of the decision of the medical board, it was open to the insurance officer to award injury benefit on the ground that incapacity for work was due to the infarction and that that was caused by the accident. As I have said the ground on which the award was made is not recorded. It may have been on account of the hernia or the heart condition or both. One does not know. If it was awarded wholly or partly on account of the heart condition, then, if *Re Dowling*¹⁹ is to be applied, it was not open to the medical appeal tribunal to say that the accident had not caused the infarction and they and the commissioner erred in law in that respect.

- b So, again, if *Re Dowling*¹⁹ is followed, in my view if it be assumed that the insurance officer made his award on account of the heart condition, I see no alternative to allowing the appeal in the appellant Hudson's case. I do not, however, think that that should be assumed. It is for the appellant to show that that was the ground of the insurance officer's decision. Owing to the failure to record the grounds for that decision, he is not in a position to do so and consequently, although I do not regard it as a satisfactory result, even if *Re Dowling*¹⁹ stands, in my opinion his appeal fails. The fact that an insurance officer can award injury benefit without disclosing or recording his grounds for doing so does, however, lend some support to my view that decisions on injury benefit claims are distinct from and do not affect claims for disablement benefit and vice versa.

- d I now turn to the question whether *Re Dowling*¹⁹ should be followed. It is a comparatively recent decision and may not as yet have affected many claims. It is simply a decision on the construction of a statute. It is of great importance that the law should be as certain as possible and only in rare cases should this House regard a previous decision by the House as one not to be followed. Nevertheless, if the view be that the decision is clearly wrong, it is I think easier to decide that a recent case should not be followed than if it is one that has stood for a long time, for if it is in the latter category many may have acted in reliance on it. I see no valid reason for thinking that this House should be especially reluctant to correct an error if the decision thought to be wrong is as to the construction of a statute.

- e If *Re Dowling*¹⁹ is adhered to, I think that it is bound to be productive of anomalies between claimants for benefits out of the Industrial Injuries Fund. I think that that decision was wrong and also that the distinction sought to be drawn between that case and these appeals is also invalid and would, if valid, be productive of serious anomalies. When Lord Gardiner LC announced on 26th July 1966²⁰ the change in practice then adopted, he said, inter alia, that we should 'depart from a previous decision when it appears right to do so'. I think that it would be right to do so on this occasion and therefore would dismiss both appeals.

- f If I cannot conclude this speech without referring to one matter which caused me considerable concern. The medical appeal tribunal in the appellant Hudson's case appear to have held the opinion that myocardial infarction could not be caused by exertion. If that is right, the onset of the infarction was an unhappy coincidence with the lifting of a heavy weight. Our attention was drawn to a recent decision reported in the Digest of Decisions of the Commissioners published by the Stationery Office under the number R(1) 12/68 where it was held that infarction resulted from the effort required to lift a wardrobe. In that case the opinions of two eminent men in the medical profession were obtained. In the light of this decision it would seem that there has been a change in medical opinion and that it is possible that if the appellants Jones's and Hudson's claims for disablement benefit had now to be decided, they would meet with a different fate.

- g It does not appear that there is any provision in the Act which enables a decision by the medical authorities to be reviewed in consequence of a change of opinion in the medical profession or of advances in medical knowledge. It is, I think, regrettable that there is no power to review such decisions on those grounds.

For the reasons I have stated, in my opinion both appeals should be dismissed.

LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, in order to avoid repetition and to simplify comparisons I have set out the basic relevant facts in a table (on the opposite page) which I hope enables the proper place and effect of *Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union (Re Dowling)*¹ to be seen. The dates of the various events repay a moment's study, for they illustrate, without nearly exhausting, the variety of the order, character and quality of decisions which may be found in individual cases, and the haphazard consequences which may flow from holding 'final', in the sense of 'conclusive for all purposes', whatever decision may come first. This may be anything from a reasoned decision on appeal by a body of medical experts after a full examination of evidence or by a commissioner on a full oral hearing (cf Dowling's case¹) to a decision evidenced by the affixing of a stamp by an insurance officer without any record of the grounds on which it proceeded, these being only ascertainable by inference (cf the appellant Hudson's case). No rational system can fail to take account of these differences; no verbal considerations in the statute should so compel.

I shall not repeat the conclusions to which I came in Dowling's case¹; to do so would be otiose now that they have been so effectively restated by the noble and learned Lords in the present appeals. The question which now has to be faced is whether the decision in *Re Dowling*¹ should be followed or departed from, and is one, for me, more difficult than the questions of construction which *Re Dowling*¹ and the present appeals involve.

There is no doubt where, normally, my predisposition would lie. On a question of construction of an Act of Parliament, as to which this House has the last word until Parliament itself intervenes, there are strong objections against a change of course by this House. Unless the cases, first and subsequent, wholly coincide, there may be a doubt which decision of the House, on one point or another arising in a future case, prevails, and litigants may be encouraged in future disputes, under this and other Acts, to take the chance of an appeal here, in the hope of procuring a departure, when otherwise they would not have done so. So even though (as I do) I found the decision in *Re Dowling*¹ unacceptable, I should be disposed to follow it.

I am so willing, insofar as *Re Dowling*¹ proceeded on the identification of accident with injury, even though this conclusion was based on an unverified assumption that this was an exceptional case. *Re Dowling*¹ was treated as such a case, and both majority opinions made this identification the basis of decision. The medical boards could not, it was said, reach a conclusion which would destroy the basis of their jurisdiction. It is when one goes further than this that I find difficulty. It is now said that *Re Dowling*¹ is authority for the proposition that 'final' in s 36 (3) of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946 (s 50 (1) of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1965) means conclusive for the purpose of any claim to benefit. This is now said to be so generally, and not only in the special accident/injury case which *Re Dowling*¹ was.

I cannot bring myself to accept this. To do so means not merely accepting *Re Dowling*¹ but vastly extending it. It means applying to all cases under these Acts the principle of the finality of the first decision. This, to my mind, and I regret that I cannot be more unemphatic, is contrary to the plainest indications in the Act itself, is a conclusion not fully argued out in the opinions in *Re Dowling*¹, and is one likely to produce confusion and haphazard results. Of these the appellant Hudson's case is an excellent illustration, and the appellant Hudson's case is at least as normal a type of proceeding as *Re Dowling*¹. My loyalty to stare decisis, and my respect for those who decided *Re Dowling*¹, cannot extend so far as this and I would, in agreement with my noble and learned friends, Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Diplock, take another view.

I think there is no doubt that unless *Re Dowling*¹ is followed on this point, of what 'final' involves, neither appeal can succeed. So I must agree with those of your Lordships who would dismiss them.

LORD PEARSON. My Lords, in my opinion the decision of this House in *Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union (Re Dowling)*³ ought to be followed in the present cases for several reasons. a

First, there is the principle of stare decisis. A decision of this House has had the distinctive advantage of being final both in the sense that it put an end to the litigation between the parties and in the sense that it established the principle embodied in the ratio decidendi. Consequently it provided a firm foundation on which commercial, financial and fiscal arrangements could be based. Also it marked a definite step in the development of the law, irreversible except by Act of Parliament. This distinctive advantage of finality should not be thrown away by too ready use of the recently declared liberty to depart from previous decisions. b

Secondly, in *Dowling's case*³ the courts were confronted with a difficult question of construction arising under a complicated statute. The decision of such questions depends largely on an impression as to the meaning of words in their context, and often different minds have different impressions so that a divergence of opinion results. That is what happened in *Dowling's case*³. There were two conflicting views and each of them was tenable. That which ultimately became the minority view was taken by the three members of the Divisional Court, by one member of the Court of Appeal⁴ and by one of my noble and learned friends in this House. The view which became the majority view was taken by two members of the Court of Appeal⁴ and by four of my noble and learned friends in this House. On a count of judicial voices one might say the slender majority of six to five is not sufficient to prove conclusively the correctness of the view which prevailed, but the voices in favour afford unimpeachable evidence that it is a tenable view, in the absence of any demonstration that it was arrived at per incuriam or is for some other reason clearly unmain- c tainable. No such demonstration has been given. That seems to me a sufficient reason for not overruling the decision in *Dowling's case*³. If a tenable view taken by a majority in the first appeal could be overruled by a majority preferring another tenable view in a second appeal, then the original tenable view could be restored by a majority preferring it in a third appeal. Finality of decision would be utterly lost. d

Thirdly, I must, with respect to all concerned, express my opinion that on the merits the decision of the majority in *Dowling's case*³ is acceptable and should be followed. f

Both for the explanation of the decision in *Dowling's case*³ and for the decision of the present appeals it is necessary to examine some of the provisions of Part II of the relevant Act relating to entitlement to benefit and some of the provisions of Part III relating to the determination of questions and claims. The general point that emerges is that there is a division of jurisdiction between several authorities or sets of authorities, and it is essential to see what are the lines of demarcation between their respective spheres of jurisdiction. g

The relevant Act has been taken for the purposes of these appeals to be the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946, as amended by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1953. It has been agreed that, so far as these appeals are concerned, no material difference would be made by taking the corresponding provisions of later Acts. h

In Part II of the relevant Act, s 7 (1) provides:

(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, where an insured person suffers personal injury caused on or after the appointed day by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, being insurable employment, then— i
(a) industrial injury benefit (in this Act referred to as "injury benefit") shall be

- a payable to the insured person if during such period as is hereinafter provided he is, as the result of the injury, incapable of work; (b) industrial disablement benefit (in this Act referred to as "disablement benefit") shall be payable to the insured person if at a time not falling within the said period he suffers, as the result of the injury, from such loss of physical or mental faculty as is hereinafter provided; (c) industrial death benefit (in this Act referred to as "death benefit") shall be payable to such persons as are hereinafter provided if the death of the insured person results from the injury.'

The opening words of s 11 (1) provide:

'An insured person shall be entitled to injury benefit in respect of any day on which, as the result of the relevant injury, he is incapable of work during the injury benefit period . . .'

- c The opening words of s 12 (1), as amended by s 33 of the 1953 Act, provide:

'Subject to the next following subsection, an insured person shall be entitled to disablement benefit if he suffers as the result of the relevant accident from loss of physical or mental faculty such that the extent of the resulting disablement assessed in accordance with the following provisions of this section amounts to not less than one per cent . . .'

- d Sections 19 to 24 provide death benefits for various persons—widows, widowers, children of the deceased's family, parents, relatives and women having the care of the deceased's children—if the appropriate conditions are fulfilled.

- e The first few lines of s 7 (1) have been treated as raising one composite question whether the claimant (or the deceased if the claim is for a death benefit) sustained an industrial accident and this composite question has been referred to as 'the gateway question', because a claimant for benefit has to obtain a favourable answer to this question before he can, so to speak, pass through the gate and into the field where he will be eligible for one of the three benefits if he fulfils the conditions appropriate to that benefit. The composite question can be resolved into the component questions which are its elements, namely, (1) whether the claimant (or the deceased in some cases) was an insured person; (2) whether he suffered personal injury; (3) whether the personal injury was caused by accident; (4) whether the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment, and (5) whether the employment was insurable employment. The claimant must obtain a favourable answer to each of these component questions before he can pass through the gate.

- g In Part III of the relevant Act s 36 makes the division of jurisdiction between the several authorities or sets of authorities. Under sub-s (1) (a) the Minister (i.e. in 1946 the Minister of National Insurance) is to determine six classes of questions, of which the first is whether a person is or was employed in insurable employment. Under sub-s (1) (b) various questions as to family relationships, such as might arise on claims for death benefit, are to be determined in like manner as corresponding questions under the Family Allowances Act 1945. Subsection (1) (c) provides that—

- h 'any question—(i) whether the relevant accident has resulted in a loss of faculty; . . . (iii) at what degree the extent of disablement resulting from a loss of faculty is to be assessed, and what period is to be taken into account by the assessment; shall be determined by a medical board or medical appeal tribunal constituted in accordance with the following provisions of this Act.'

- j The medical board and the medical appeal tribunal have been conveniently referred to as 'the medical authorities', and this expression can include also the commissioner (i.e. the national insurance commissioner) when determining an appeal from a medical appeal tribunal.

Section 36 (2) provides:

'Subject to the foregoing provisions of this section, any claim for benefit and any question arising in connection with a claim for or award of benefit shall be determined by an insurance officer, a local appeal tribunal or the Commissioner appointed or constituted in accordance with the following provisions of this Act.' a

The insurance officer and the local appeal tribunal have been referred to as 'the statutory authorities' and this expression can include also the commissioner when determining an appeal from a local appeal tribunal. Although the expression is convenient for distinguishing these authorities from the medical authorities, it would not be right to infer that the 'statutory authorities' are wholly unmedical. Under s 43, whereas sub-s (1) provides for local appeal tribunals to consist of employers' representatives and insured persons' representatives and a chairman appointed by the Minister, sub-s (2) provides: b

'Regulations may make provision that in such cases as may be prescribed one or more medical practitioners shall sit with the tribunal either as additional members or as assessors and for the appointment by the Minister of medical practitioners to act for this purpose either generally or for such cases or for such tribunals as the Minister may determine.' c

Section 36 (3) provides:

'Except as provided by this Part of this Act or by the Family Allowances Act, 1945, as applied by paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of this section, any decision of a claim or question as provided by the foregoing provisions of this section shall be final.' d

Section 36 (5) provides:

'Any such question as is mentioned in subsection (1) of this section is hereafter in this Act referred to as a "special question", and the questions mentioned in paragraph (c) of that subsection are hereafter so referred to as the "disablement questions." ' e

Section 39 (1) by its opening words provides that the case of any claimant for disablement benefit shall be— f

'referred by the insurance officer to a medical board for determination of the disablement questions in accordance with the following provisions of this Part of this Act relating to the determination of claims . . . '

Section 45 (1) and (2) provide:

'(1) All claims for benefit shall be submitted forthwith to one of the insurance officers and, subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, all questions arising in connection with any such claim or with an award of benefit shall in the first instance be so submitted. g

'(2) The insurance officer shall forthwith take into consideration any claim or question submitted to him for examination as aforesaid.'

Subsection (3) contains provisions for the action to be taken by an insurance officer if on consideration of a claim or question he is of opinion that no special question arises. Section 48 (1) provides: h

'If on consideration of a claim or question the insurance officer is of opinion that a special question arises, he shall, subject to and in accordance with regulations—(a) refer the special question for determination as required by this Part of this Act; and (b) deal with any other question as if the special question had not arisen.' j

Section 48 (2) authorises the making of regulations giving some latitude as to the order in which questions are to be dealt with.

Section 49 provides for the making of a declaration that the relevant accident

- a was an industrial accident, even if a claim for benefit is disallowed for other reasons and even if no claim for benefit has been made. Subsection (4) provides:

‘Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act as to appeal and review, any declaration under this section that an accident was or was not an industrial accident shall be conclusive for the purposes of any claim for benefit in respect of that accident, whether or not the claimant is the person at whose instance the declaration was made.’

Subsection (5), so far as it is material for the present purpose, provides:

‘For the purposes of this section, an accident whereby a person suffers personal injury shall be deemed, in relation to him, to be an industrial accident if—(a) it arises out of and in the course of his employment; (b) that employment is insurable employment . . .’

There are in this Part of the Act various provisions for appeal from and review of determinations.

Under s 36 (3), subject to certain exceptions ‘any decision of a claim or question as provided by the foregoing provisions of this section shall be final’. One has to consider (i) what are the questions to the decision of which finality attaches and (ii) what is the scope or degree or nature of the finality.

The questions to the decision of which finality attaches must, I think, include the questions referred to in sub-s (1), which are there described as ‘questions arising under this Act’, and are ‘special questions’ by virtue of sub-s (5). Also under sub-s (5) disablement questions are a species of the genus special questions. Furthermore, the questions to the decision of which finality attaches must, I think, include the residual questions which are to be determined by the statutory authorities under sub-s (2) and are there described (subject to the foregoing provisions of the section) as ‘any question arising in connection with a claim for or award of benefit’. It can be inferred from s 46 (2) that a distinction is to be drawn between decisions, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, findings on questions of fact material to the decision.

I think it is clear from s 49 that finality attaches to the decision of the composite question whether there was an industrial accident. But I think finality also attaches to decisions of the component questions arising under ss 7 and 49. One of the component questions is whether the claimant (or the deceased) was employed in insurable employment. That is a special question to be determined by the Minister, and it seems clear from s 36 (1) and (3) that his determination of this question must be final. It is reasonable to suppose that finality attaches equally to the other component questions including the questions whether the claimant (or the deceased) suffered injury and whether the injury was caused by accident, and whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment. These are residual questions. They are not special questions to be decided as provided under s 36 (1). Therefore, they fall into residue, so to speak, and can only be determined by the statutory authorities under sub-s (2). These questions arise in every case—they are ‘gateway questions’—and they must be determined by somebody, and there is no one else to determine them except the statutory authorities. I think finality attaches to the decision by the statutory authorities of each of these component questions—whether the person suffered injury, whether the injury was caused by accident, and whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment.

f

h

j

Then what is the scope or degree or nature of the finality which attaches to the decision of these questions? For what purpose is the decision final? Conceivably the finality might be only for the purposes of a claim to some particular benefit— injury benefit or disablement benefit or death benefit. But that does not seem appropriate in relation to the decision of the composite ‘gateway question’ or its component questions to which I have referred. These are not specially related to particular benefits. They are the common and fundamental questions, on each of

It seems to me there is a division of jurisdiction, and, so far as is material for present purposes, the lines of demarcation are not difficult to discern, and they are evidently intended to prevent contradictory decisions being given by different authorities on the same question. The special questions are assigned to the authorities specified in s 36 (1), and the residual questions are assigned to the statutory authorities by sub-s (2). If the Minister has decided that a person was in insurable employment, surely it is not open to the statutory authorities or the medical authorities to say that he was not. If the medical authorities have decided that the relevant accident resulted in a loss of faculty, surely it is not open to the Minister or the statutory authorities to say it did not? Then equally if the statutory authorities decide that a person sustained personal injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, surely it is not open to the Minister or the medical authorities to say he did not? It seems to me to follow from the scheme of determinations for which Part III of the Act provides that a determination by one set of authorities within its proper sphere of jurisdiction must be accepted, and must not be contradicted or ignored, by the other authorities or sets of authorities. b

The insurance officer, being one of the statutory authorities and the initiator, decides whether there was an injury-causing accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. Then he refers the case to the medical authorities for them to determine the disablement questions, the first of which is whether the relevant accident has resulted in a loss of faculty. What is the relevant accident? By definition in s 88 it is 'in relation to any benefit, the accident . . . in respect of which that benefit is claimed or payable'. Initially, when the claimant first makes his claim, there is only an alleged injury-causing accident. But when the insurance officer has decided that the alleged injury-causing accident happened, it must be assumed that it did happen, and that necessary assumption is the basis of the reference to the medical authorities and they must accept it as the basis of their determination of the disablement questions. c

When the statutory authorities decide that an injury-causing accident has happened, they must identify it. In many cases it could be identified without describing in detail or with exactness the nature of the injury: it would be sufficient to state the nature of the injury in general terms, e.g. 'broke his leg' or 'multiple injuries' or 'strained himself' or 'suffered internal injuries'. In such cases the medical authorities would have to accept that there was an accident and that it did cause injury of the general nature described, but they would be at liberty, in considering whether any disability resulted, to form their own view as to the nature of the injury so long as this view was not inconsistent with the general description given in the statutory authorities' decision. d

The special feature of Dowling's case⁶ was that the injury was not something separable from the accident: there was no accident apart from the injury. The decision of the statutory authorities was that in effect the heavy work brought on a hiatus hernia; apart from the hiatus hernia there was no accident; the causation of the hiatus hernia by the heavy work was the essence of the accident and a necessary part of its identification. Therefore, when the medical authorities decided that the hiatus hernia was not brought on by the heavy work, they were denying the happening of the accident and thereby contradicting the decision of the statutory authorities and so exceeding their jurisdiction. e

In my opinion, the case of the appellant Jones is similar in principle to Dowling's case⁶ and should be decided in the same way. This appellant, when doing some heavy work, felt pain in his back. Some days later he was found to be suffering from myocardial infarction. The insurance officer however, dismissed this appellant's claim for injury benefit on the ground that his incapacity for work was due to the f a myocardial infarction and the myocardial infarction was not brought on by the heavy work and so there was no injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. But then this appellant appealed to the local appeal tribunal, and they reversed the decision of the insurance officer, holding that the heavy work did bring on the myocardial infarction, so that there was an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment and as it caused incapacity injury benefit was payable. As there was no further appeal, this decision stood. When this appellant b claimed disablement benefit, the case was duly referred to the medical board for them to decide the disablement questions. The happening and nature of the accident, as decided by the local appeal tribunal, were notified to the medical authorities in this way. On the back of the file sent to the medical board was set out 'Information supplied by National Insurance Office' and para 4, so far as material, was in these terms: 'Description of the incident accepted as the industrial accident . . . Whilst c lifting a buffer on to wagon he sustained a myocardial infarction'. That paragraph correctly stated the effect of the local appeal tribunal's decision. Thus the relevant accident as determined by the statutory authorities and notified to the medical authorities was heavy work causing myocardial infarction. The medical authorities should have taken that determination as the basis of their determination of the disablement questions; they should have determined what was the loss of faculty d resulting from that accident, the occurrence of which they had to assume. Instead of doing that, they held that the heavy work only caused back strain and did not cause the myocardial infarction. Thus their decision contradicted the decision of the statutory authorities as to the happening and nature of the accident, and was ultra vires. The commissioner on appeal held that the decision of the medical authorities was not ultra vires. In my opinion, his decision was incorrect in law and the order e of certiorari should issue. Accordingly I would allow the appeal in the case of the appellant Jones.

The case of the appellant Hudson is more difficult. I will not attempt to describe the series of events, because that has been described in the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, which I have had the advantage of f reading. One has to ascertain what was the ultimate decision of the statutory authorities—in this case only the insurance officer—as to the happening and nature of the accident.

I think it is clear that this appellant was incapacitated for work in the period following the accident by the heart trouble, the myocardial infarction, and not by the inguinal hernia. He must have thought at that time that the heart trouble was unconnected with the accident. For that reason he did not then claim injury benefit, g but did claim and obtain sickness benefit and a declaration that he had suffered an industrial accident. Also for that reason, when he claimed disablement benefit he claimed it only in respect of the hernia. This claim was duly referred to the medical board for them to determine the disablement questions. On the back of the file sent to the medical board the 'Information supplied by local office' contained in para 4 the words: 'Description of incident accepted as the industrial h accident—Whilst lifting a piece of electronic equipment he strained himself'. That was at that time the insurance officer's decision as to the happening and nature of the accident, and the medical board acted consistently with the insurance officer's decision when they assessed the disability in respect of the hernia only and treated the heart trouble as an unconnected condition because there was no claim in respect of it.

i But the medical board included in their report observations which showed that in their opinion the heart trouble might be in truth connected with the accident. The insurance officer must have taken into account these observations and the letters from this appellant's solicitors and the medical opinion of Dr Somerville that there was a direct causal relationship between the development of the heart trouble and this appellant's physical effort earlier on 19th January 1965. When the insurance officer gave instructions for the difference between sickness benefit and injury benefit to be paid to this appellant for the period from 19th January 1965, this involved a decision that injury benefit was payable, which on the facts could only be on the basis that the heart trouble was connected with the physical effort—in other words, that the accident was hard work causing myocardial infarction. I suppose that this further decision as to the happening and nature of the accident can be regarded as an amplification or interpretation of the previous decision—‘Whilst lifting a piece of electronic equipment he strained himself’—and not as a departure from it. Certainly more formal procedure would have been preferable. The further decision seems not to have been formulated nor recorded nor communicated to the medical board or the medical appeal tribunal. The medical appeal tribunal cannot be blamed for not accepting and following this further decision if it was not communicated to them. But it would not be right for this appellant’s claim to be defeated by lack of communication between the authorities or by any other procedural omission on their part for which he was not responsible. Notwithstanding the procedural difficulties, I think effect should be given to the merits of this appellant’s position, and I would allow the appeal.

LORD DIPLOCK. My Lords, there are four questions for determination by this House in these conjoined appeals:

(1) What was the ratio decidendi of this House in Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union (Re Dowling)? (2) Does it govern either or both of the instant appeals? (3) If so, was it wrong? (4) If it was wrong, should it be overruled?

The statutory provisions which fell to be construed in Dowling’s case⁷ were those of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946, as it had been amended in 1953. They have since been replaced by corresponding provisions in the consolidation Act of 1965, but it is common ground that this consolidation entailed no alteration in the existing law. My noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne, has already analysed sufficiently the relevant provisions of the Act of 1946 (as amended). I can go straight to the question: what did the majority of this House decide in Dowling’s case⁷?

There were two different rationes decidendi, one expressed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, the other by my noble and learned friend, Lord Hodson. It was with the latter that my noble and learned friends, Lord Reid and Lord Guest, concurred. It therefore represents the ratio decidendi of this House which must be either followed or overruled⁷.

In Dowling’s case⁷ the claimant had alleged that as a result of physical exertion in the course of doing the ordinary work for which he was employed he had suffered a single identifiable internal injury—hiatus hernia. There was thus no incident occurring in the course of the claimant’s employment which could be identified as having any of the characteristics of an ‘accident’ unless it was in fact the cause of the hiatus hernia which he sustained. The claim for injury benefit had been decided on appeal by the deputy commissioner after hearing oral evidence from medical experts.

It is apparent that all four members of this House who were in favour of dismissing the appeal regarded it as being an exceptional and not an ordinary case. The ratio decidendi of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest was, as I read his speech, confined to cases in which a claim was made in respect of (1) a single identifiable internal injury; (2) alleged to be caused by doing the ordinary work for which the claimant was employed. Lord Hodson also, in the passage cited by my noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne, which contains the kernel of his reasoning says⁸:

‘In the ordinary case where accident and injury are separate, there is no difficulty, but here the accident and the injury are the same. There would be no accident but for the injury.’

a It is reasonable to infer from this that those members of this House who formed the majority in Dowling's case⁹ were not alerted to the fact that, taken at its face value, the reasoning of Lord Hodson could not be limited in its applicability to cases which exhibited the exceptional characteristics to which I have drawn attention as presented by Dowling's case⁹ itself. In the passage cited from Lord Hodson's speech the wide construction placed on the expressions 'question' and 'final' in s 36 (3) of the Act, makes the reasoning equally applicable to any finding as to the medical nature of the injury suffered by any claimant which has been made by an insurance officer, on whatever material happened to be available to him, in the course of dealing with a claim for injury benefit or for a declaration that an accident was an industrial accident.

b My Lords, the second question can be quickly answered in the instant appeal by the appellant Jones. A local appeal tribunal had found that the appellant Jones's accident had caused myocardial infarction. On Lord Hodson's reasoning in Dowling's case⁹ the medical board and medical appeal tribunal were bound to accept this finding as correct. In the case of the appellant Hudson, however, the insurance officer made no express finding as to the medical nature of the injuries which the appellant Hudson suffered as a result of his accident. That the insurance officer was satisfied that the accident had caused the myocardial infarction as well as the hernia is no more than an inference, though a strong one, from his act in authorising the payment of injury benefit to the appellant Hudson. But if I were able to accept the ratio decidendi of the majority in Dowling's case⁹ I do not think that I ought to boggle at this. It would be very hard luck for the appellant Hudson if I did. This makes it necessary to embark on the third question: was the ratio decidendi of the majority in Dowling's case⁹ wrong?

e The function of this House in Dowling's case⁹, as in the instant appeals, was to ascertain how Parliament intended that claims for benefit under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946 should be dealt with in factual circumstances such as those found to exist in Dowling's case⁹ and in the instant appeals. That Act was one of several which together wrought a major change in social policy and introduced the welfare state. To find out the meaning of particular provisions in social legislation of this character calls, in the first instance, for a purposive approach to the Act as a whole to ascertain the social ends it was intended to achieve and the practical means by which it was expected to achieve them. Meticulous linguistic analysis of words and phrases used in different contexts in particular sections of the Act should be subordinate to this purposive approach. It should not distract your Lordships from it.

g When in 1946 the government of the day promoted and Parliament passed the first National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, and National Insurance Act, there had been many years experience of the operation of the Workmen's Compensation Acts and the recording of industrial accidents for the purposes of the Factory Acts. Parliament must have been well aware that the number of claims for injury benefit of which one of the qualifying criteria, namely, incapacity for work, was the same as that for sickness benefit under the National Insurance Act, would run into thousands a week, and that in the great majority of them there would be readily available sufficient material from reliable sources to verify the claim, i.e. a medical certificate from the claimant's doctor and a report of the accident from his employer.

h The social purpose of injury benefit was to provide the claimant with an income to replace his earning while he was incapable of work. It was a short-term benefit available for a period not exceeding six months from the date of the accident. It would fail in its social purpose unless it were allowed quickly. One would, therefore, expect that Parliament contemplated a statutory procedure for the examination and allowance of claims which would be administratively simple and speedy in the great majority of cases.

Given the number of claims for injury benefit which Parliament must have contemplated, it must also have contemplated that the vast majority of them would be disposed of in the claimant's favour by the insurance officer to whom by s 45 (1) of the Act all claims for benefit were to be submitted in the first instance. Otherwise local appeal tribunals and the commissioner and his deputies would have been overwhelmed. Experience has indeed shown that only about one claim in every two hundred goes to a local appeal tribunal. An insurance officer has no medical qualifications to enable him of his own knowledge to diagnose the claimant's injury or to determine whether it renders him incapable of work. Parliament must have contemplated that an insurance officer would normally rely on a certificate from the claimant's own doctor for this diagnosis and would normally rely on the claimant's own written description of the accident which caused the injury, verified, if thought necessary, by the employer's report of it.

My Lords, before allowing a claim for injury benefit the insurance officer must no doubt be satisfied (1) that some incident occurred in the course of the claimant's employment, (2) that the incident was a cause of some personal injury to him, and (3) that as a result of the injury he was incapable of work on the days for which injury benefit is claimed. But provided that the insurance officer is satisfied that the incident occurred and that it resulted in the incapacity for work, there is no need for him to be satisfied as to the precise medical nature of the personal injury which constitutes the intermediate link in the chain of causation. Parliament must have contemplated that the insurance officer would normally accept as sufficient without further enquiry whatever description of the incapacitating injury appeared on the medical certificate signed by the claimant's own doctor, however detailed or summary as a diagnosis that description might be. But Parliament can hardly have contemplated that the acceptance of that diagnosis as justification for payment of injury benefit, it may be only for a single day, should affect conclusively the claimant's future rights to a different kind of benefit, disablement benefit, which might endure for the remainder of his life and which had not yet been the subject of any claim.

Injury benefit becomes payable three days after an incapacitating accident and continues to be payable at a daily rate for a total period of six months if the incapacity for work so long endures. Disablement benefit is not payable until the claimant's right to injury benefit is exhausted, either because he has become capable of work or because six months have elapsed since the accident. The need for haste which is a dominant factor in achieving the social purpose of injury benefit is not of comparable importance in claims for disablement benefit. The right to disablement benefit is not dependent on incapacity for work, although it may be increased if the disablement also results in total or partial incapacity for work. Its primary social purpose is to recompense the claimant for his loss of the amenities of life during the period for which he suffers physical or mental disabilities from the accident—which may be for the remainder of his life.

In order to assess the rate of any disablement benefit to which a claimant is entitled and the period for which it will be payable it is always necessary to make an accurate diagnosis of the medical condition of the claimant, to determine to what extent any morbid condition diagnosed was a result of the accident and not of some other congenital defect, injury or disease and to make an accurate prognosis of the likelihood of any future improvement in his condition and, if there is a likelihood, of when the improvement can be expected to occur. On the result of this diagnosis and prognosis may depend the claimant's entitlement to a disablement pension for the remainder of his life.

One would, therefore, expect that Parliament would provide machinery for a more thorough and expert diagnosis and prognosis of the claimant's medical condition resulting from the injury where a claim was for disablement benefit, than whatever diagnostic material happened to be available to an insurance officer at an earlier date when he was called on to deal with a claim for injury benefit. For, as already pointed

- a out, this would be likely to consist of no more than a hastily prepared certificate of incapacity for work by a general practitioner of unknown diagnostic skill and professional expertise in specialised branches of medicine. This natural expectation is borne out by the requirement in ss 36, 39 and 48 of the Act, that the case of a claimant for disablement benefit is to be referred to a medical board for the determination of the questions: whether the relevant accident has resulted in a loss of faculty; and at what degree the extent of disablement resulting from a loss of faculty is to be assessed, and what period is to be taken into account by the assessment.

b My Lords, in this broad analysis of what appears to be the rational basis of the Act, I have been referring to the ordinary kind of case which must have been in the forefront of Parliament's contemplation. It is one in which the insurance officer, as he is entitled to do, allows a claim for injury benefit on no other medical diagnostic material than that which the claimant's own general practitioner has chosen to set out in a certificate of the claimant's incapacity for work at some period within six months after the accident. From such a decision by the insurance officer there is no appeal; although there is one from his disallowance of a claim.

c It is true that the Act contemplates that regulations may be made empowering, although not requiring, an insurance officer himself to obtain reports from other medical practitioners and to refer claims as to which he finds himself in doubt to a local appeal tribunal who may be similarly empowered, and in addition may be empowered to summon witnesses to give oral evidence. There may, thus, be cases, and *Dowling's case*¹⁰ was one of them, where on a claim for injury benefit there is an abundance of expert medical reports and oral evidence directed to the diagnosis of the claimant's medical condition and its cause. But this will not be so except in a tiny proportion of the total of claims. Parliament might rationally have decided to provide that subsequent claims for disablement benefit, in those exceptional cases where there had already been a thorough investigation of the medical aspects of the claim for injury benefit, should be dealt with by a procedure different from that applicable in the ordinary case where no medical investigation had been made beyond acceptance by an insurance officer of the certificates of the claimant's general practitioner. But I do not understand that anyone contends that Parliament has done so in the Act. If previous diagnoses of the medical consequences of the incident relied on by the claimant accepted for the purposes of a claim for injury benefit are to be binding on a medical board in any subsequent claim for disablement benefit, this must be so whether the diagnosis was accepted by the commissioner, a local appeal tribunal or an insurance officer and whatever was the material on which acceptance of the diagnoses was based.

g Does, then, the actual language of s 36 (3) of the Act drive one to the inescapable conclusion that, despite the conferment on the medical authorities (medical boards and medical appeal tribunals) of exclusive jurisdiction to determine 'the disablement questions' as defined in s 36 (1) (c), they are nevertheless bound to accept as correct the opinion previously formed by an insurance officer as to the medical condition of the claimant and its cause, however exiguous the diagnostic material on which his opinion was based, and however demonstrably false in the light of medical knowledge his opinion may have been?

h Lord Hodson's reasoning in *Dowling's case*¹⁰ was dependent on the meanings which he expressly ascribed to the words 'question' and 'final' in s 36 (3) and to the meanings of the expressions 'accident' and 'personal injury' which are implicit in his statement 'here the accident and injury are the same'. It is thus necessary to examine the ways in which these three words are used in the Act. But before doing so there are two preliminary observations I desire to make.

i The first is that by the time a long and controversial bill becomes a statute one must not be surprised to find some lack of consistency between the language used in one section and that used in another. The second is that the attention of the draftsman and of Parliament will have been concentrated on the ordinary type of case to which it was contemplated that the statute would apply. Little light is thrown on the intention of Parliament by testing the meaning of the words of a statute by seeing what would be the result of applying them in that meaning to some unlikely or even fanciful hypothesis of fact. The result may be one which Parliament would have taken measures to avoid if it had given its mind to that particular concatenation of circumstances. But that is an insufficient reason for rejecting a meaning of the words which leads to that result, if that meaning leads to a sensible result in the ordinary type of case which must have been within the contemplation of Parliament.

The Act of 1946 (which I will call 'the statute') creates and regulates the entitlement of insured persons to three separate and distinct kinds of benefit: injury benefit, disablement benefit and death benefit. Each kind of benefit is payable in respect of a different period. There is no overlapping. Each kind of benefit is the subject of a separate and distinct claim. The conditions of entitlement to each kind of benefit are different. All that is common to them is that successive rights to each of the three kinds of benefit may arise from the same 'accident'.

Section 7, which contains the general description of and conditions of entitlement to each of the three benefits, avoids the use of the compound phrase 'personal injury by accident' which had appeared in successive Workmen's Compensation Acts since 1897. It is reasonable to suppose that the change in phraseology was deliberate—although there is an isolated lapse into the expression 'personal injury by accident' in s 49 (2) of the statute.

In the context of the statute 'accident' is used as descriptive of the first event in three claims of causation:

- (1) Accident—personal injury—incapability of work.
- (2) Accident—personal injury—loss of faculty—disablement.
- (3) Accident—personal injury—death.

The occurrence of the last event in each chain creates the entitlement to the particular benefit; injury benefit, disablement benefit or death benefit. It is, thus, accurate to speak of any later event in the chain as resulting from any earlier event; of loss of faculty as resulting from an accident, as the draftsman of the statute did in s 12 (as amended by the Act of 1953) and s 36; or as resulting from a personal injury as he did in ss 7 and 12 (prior to the amendment). It might have been for neater draftsmanship to have amended s 7 also in 1953; but there was no necessity to do so. It is also accurate to speak of a claim for benefit being made in respect of any event in the chain of causation: as being made in respect of an accident or as being made in respect of an injury as the draftsman did in s 88. I find no real linguistic difficulty in any of the expressions used in the statute to describe the successive events in these three chains of causation.

In popular speech 'accident', the first event in each chain, is used in a variety of meanings of which the common characteristics are unexpectedness and, generally, misfortune. As was pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in *Fenton v Thorley & Co Ltd*¹¹ it embraces both an event which was not intended by the person who suffers the misfortune and an event which, although intended by the person who caused it to occur, resulted in a misfortune to him which he did not intend. An event which constitutes an 'accident' with which the statute is concerned, has two limiting characteristics: the misfortune which it causes must be 'personal injury' to an insured person; and the event must be one which can be identified as arising out of and in the course of that person's employment. It cannot be the 'personal injury' itself of which it is described as the cause. It must be something external which has some physiological or psychological effect on that part of the sufferer's anatomy which sustains the actual trauma, or some bodily activity of the sufferer which would be perceptible to an a observer if one were present when it occurred. It is convenient to call this external event or bodily activity the causative incident.

b It is true that the causative incident assumes its character as an 'accident' within the meaning of the statute because of its result, the 'personal injury'. But it is no more accurate to say that 'the accident and the injury are the same' where the injury is the unintended result of an intentional bodily activity of the suffered himself, than where it is the result, which ex hypothesi is not intended by the suffered, of some fortuitous event which the suffered did not himself intend. The most that can be said is that it may be easier to identify the causative incident in the latter case than in the former unless the personal injury resulting from an intentional bodily activity of the sufferer was immediately accompanied by visible or painful symptoms.

c 'Personal injury' is only an intermediate link in each of the three chains of causation of which the final result is incapability of work, death or disablement. It is used in that statute as a generic term embracing all adverse physical or mental consequences of an 'accident'. A diagnostician of sufficient skill could no doubt analyse any trauma resulting from an accident into a number of detailed components. Even the fracture of a single bone is necessarily accompanied by some damage to adjacent muscles, blood vessels and nerves. But accurate diagnosis of the personal injury is not necessary in determining entitlement to injury benefit or death benefit if it is obvious that there has been personal injury of some kind and that its consequence has been incapacity for work or death.

d In contrast, the additional link in the chain of causation between 'personal injury' and 'disablement', i.e. 'loss of faculty', in a claim for disablement benefit, and the statutory method of assessment of the degree of disablement do call for an accurate diagnosis of the personal injury resulting from the accident which is still subsisting at the time at which the claim is made. 'Loss of faculty' is used in the statute to describe a cause of disabilities to do things which in sum constitute the disablement. It is used in the medical sense of loss of power or function of an organ of the body.

e Under the statute benefit of any of the three kinds is payable as the result of an 'award of benefit' made by a statutory authority (an insurance officer, a local appeal tribunal or the commissioner) in response to a 'claim' for that particular kind of benefit by a claimant which is submitted in the first instance to an insurance officer. The submission of a claim does not give rise to any 'lis'. There is no opponent to the claim and consequently there are no 'issues' in the sense in which that term is used in relation to adversarial litigation in courts of law. The general doctrine of res judicata which operates inter partes is thus inapplicable to claims for benefit. The sole function of the insurance officer, as of any other statutory authority, is to satisfy himself whether or not the claimant is entitled to the kind of benefit he has claimed and, if so, the amount of benefit to which he is entitled. The legal consequences of his decision are those which the statute itself ascribes to it. There can be no question of issue estoppel.

f All 'claims' for benefit are ultimately disposed of by the determination of a statutory authority either to make an award or to determine that an award cannot be made (ss 45 (3) (a) and (b) (ii), 48 (2) (b)). 'Determination' connotes the activity of deciding, 'decision' connotes the result. But s 36 treats a 'claim' as capable of giving rise to more than one 'question' which may call for determination either by a statutory authority or by some other authority. 'Special questions' (other than those referred to in sub-s (1) (a) (ii), (iii) and (iv)) which include 'disablement questions' are examples of 'questions' to be determined by other authorities. The decision of a 'special question' does not of itself entitle the claimant to an award of benefit. In any claim where a 'special question' arises there must also arise other questions on which the claimant's entitlement also depends and these must be dealt with by the statutory authorities before an award of benefit can be made. The three classes of 'decision' that sub-s (3) makes 'final' are (a) the decision by a statutory authority of a claim, (b) the decision by the appropriate other authority of a 'special question' arising in connection with a claim, and (c) the decision of a statutory authority of any 'question' other than a 'special question' arising in connection with a claim. a

Section 45 (1) requires all claims for benefit, whether they raise 'special questions' or not, to be submitted in the first instance to an insurance officer. It also contemplates the submission of a 'question arising in connection with' a claim for benefit as distinct from the submission of a 'claim' itself. Subsections (2) and (3) draw a clear distinction between these types of submission.

Where a 'claim' is submitted the only 'decision' of it that the insurance officer is empowered to make under that section is either a decision to allow the claim in whole or in part or a decision that an award cannot be made. If he refers it, as he may, to a local appeal tribunal, their power of decision is similarly limited. Under s 49 (1), however, the insurance officer may be required in connection with a claim also to determine the 'question' whether the relevant accident was an industrial accident. Where a 'question' is submitted the only decision of it that the insurance officer is empowered to make is to answer 'the question' in favour of or adversely to the claimant. b

'Claimant' is defined in s 88 as 'a person claiming benefit', and, so far as is relevant for present purposes, as including also only 'an applicant for a declaration that an accident was or was not an industrial accident'. By s 49 (2) such a declaration may be applied for independently of any claim for benefit. It would seem, therefore, that the only 'question' as distinct from a 'claim', which is capable of being submitted to an insurance officer under s 45 (1) is the question whether an accident which a claimant alleges he has sustained was an industrial accident. c

The decision of any claim to benefit or of a separately submitted question whether an accident was an industrial accident may or may not involve a 'special question'; but it will inevitably make it necessary for the statutory authority to make findings of material facts. The material facts may be clear or may be subject to doubt or difficulty. It is manifest from the terms of s 46 (2) that a distinction is drawn between 'questions of fact' which are material to the decision of a claim or of a 'question' which is submitted for 'decision', and the 'question' itself which is so submitted. The former are expressed to be the subject of 'findings', to which finality is not accorded by s 36 (3). d

Sections 45 (3) and 48 (1) impose on an insurance officer the duty of analysing the 'claim' or 'question' submitted to him in order to form an opinion whether or not any 'special question' arises. I do not think that in these contexts he is required to treat a special question as arising if there is no doubt or difficulty as to the answer to it. Otherwise s 45 (3) would never be applicable. Every claim to any kind of benefit and every declaration that an accident was an industrial accident necessarily depends on whether the claimant (or the deceased) was employed in insurable employment; and that is a 'special question'. On the other hand, a 'special question' always arises in connection with a claim for disablement benefit, for the extent of the disablement which determines the amount of disablement benefit payable must be the subject of an assessment by the medical authorities which the insurance officer is not himself empowered to make. e

If as a result of his analysis the insurance officer is of opinion that a 'special question' does arise he must refer it for determination by the appropriate other authority. But this will leave other questions still to be dealt with by him before he will be in a position to make a 'decision' of the claim or of the 'question' whether the accident was an industrial accident, which was the subject of the initial submission to him. It is significant that s 48 (1) (b) uses the neutral expression 'deal with any other questions as if the special question had not arisen'. This throws one back to s 45 (3), which requires him to make 'findings' on questions of fact material to his decision and to make 'decisions' as to whether or not an award can be made or whether or not the accident was an industrial accident as the case may be. The distinction between 'dealing with' questions and the 'determination of' questions is also drawn in s 48 (2) (a). f

- a and (b). These make good sense if 'determination' is restricted to 'special questions' and the question whether the relevant accident was an industrial accident.

I conclude, therefore, that a 'decision' of a 'question' to which finality is accorded by s 36 (3) of the Act is restricted to (1) the decision of a 'special question' by the appropriate authority to determine that question under s 36 (1), and (2) the decision of the question whether an accident was an industrial accident by the statutory authority under s 49.

- b It is suggested that s 51 (1) (g), which enables regulations to be made—

'for empowering the Minister, an insurance tribunal or an insurance officer to refer to a medical practitioner for examination and report any question arising for his or their decision',

- c suggests that questions of medical fact are themselves the subject-matter of 'decisions'. The wording of that paragraph is capable of supporting such an inference, but to draw it would not only run counter to the distinction drawn between 'findings on questions of fact' and 'decisions' in s 46 (2) (b); but would lead to a further dilemma. If a question of fact material to the decision of a Minister's 'special question' is itself another 'question' for 'decision' distinct from the 'special question' itself, s 48 (1) (b) would require it to be dealt with by an insurance officer and not by the Minister.
- d The Minister would never have any power of reference under s 51 (1) (g).

- As to the meaning of the expression 'final' in relation to decisions of claims or questions, I agree with my noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne, and for the reasons which he gives, that it simply means that there shall be no further proceedings in the particular matter for determination except by way of appeal or review as provided for by the statute. It does not mean that the decision shall be conclusive in any other proceedings. Where this is intended the word 'conclusive' is used.

- e My Lords, s 39 (1) requires that:

'The case of any claimant for disablement benefit shall be referred by the insurance officer to a medical board for determination of the disablement questions . . .'

- f It thereupon becomes the duty of the medical board to enquire 'whether the relevant accident has resulted in a loss of faculty', and to assess the extent of the disablement resulting from a loss of faculty. Section 12 (2) directs them to conduct this enquiry by ascertaining all the disabilities to which the claimant may be expected to be subject during the period covered by the assessment but to exclude from the assessment any disabilities which are the result of a congenital defect or of an injury of disease received or contracted before the relevant accident.

- g In a claim for disablement benefit the insurance officer has no jurisdiction himself to determine the question whether the relevant accident resulted in any loss of faculty. Nor can he deprive the medical board of its jurisdiction to do all that the statute directs they shall do. On the other hand, the insurance officer has jurisdiction to determine the question whether the relevant accident was an industrial accident
- h and to determine the amount of benefit to which the claimant is entitled in accordance with the assessment of his disabilities made by the medical board.

- i The starting point of the enquiry into the question which the medical board has jurisdiction to determine is the same causative incident, 'the relevant accident', as constitutes the starting point of the enquiry into the question which the insurance officer has jurisdiction to determine. Where different questions relating to the same causative incident have to be determined by separate decision-making authorities, no doubt the causative incident had to be identified in order to ensure that both authorities are enquiring into the same incident. But identification of the incident is all that is needed. If, as in the statute, one of the decision-making authorities is also the authority which refers to the other decision-making authority the question which the latter has jurisdiction to determine, it cannot deprive the latter authority of its jurisdiction to determine it itself, by incorporating in the description of the causative incident any matter which is not necessary to ensure that both decision-making authorities are directing their minds to the same causative incident. The insurance officer cannot, by incorporating in his description of an identified causative incident what he believes to be its medical consequences, curtail the jurisdiction of the medical board to form their own opinion of what its medical consequences really are.

The statute is concerned with benefit for accidents and injuries that really happened. But the expressions 'relevant accident' and 'relevant injury' are used in the statute to describe the causative incident and resulting injury, in respect of which benefit is claimed, at various stages in the proceedings before what really happened has been finally determined by the appropriate decision-making authority. At the stage at which the disablement questions are referred by an insurance officer to a medical board he must be of opinion on the information then before him that at the time of the causative event alleged by the claimant in the course of his employment and that what he was doing resulted in some trauma to him however slight it may have been. Otherwise no disablement question would arise for reference. But the insurance officer's opinion as to the medical nature of the trauma or as to its continuing medical results is irrelevant for the purpose of his reaching a decision whether or not to refer the disablement questions to a medical board.

The medical board, on the other hand, on the claim being referred to them, may have to find as facts what the claimant was doing in much greater detail than was necessary to form an opinion as to whether he was doing it in the course of his employment, and what was the precise medical nature of any trauma as a result of doing it which was capable of causing any loss of faculty. It is not, however, necessary for them to enquire into whether he suffered any other trauma which was not capable of causing any loss of faculty found by the medical board to be present at the date of the reference of the disablement questions to them. It would be erroneous to suppose that a medical board has no jurisdiction to find facts as to precisely what the causative incident was, as well as what its medical consequences are at the date of the reference. The review provisions in s 40 (1) are inconsistent with any other view.

My Lords, I believe that I have now covered all the semantic points relied on by the parties at the hearing as throwing light on the meaning of the crucial words 'decision' and 'final' in s 36 (3) and the expression 'the relevant accident' in s 36 (1) (c) (i). There is nothing in this literal approach to the construction of the statute to persuade me that Parliament intended that any finding of fact as to the medical consequences of an accident made by a statutory authority for the purpose of determining a claim for injury benefit or of making a declaration that the accident was an industrial accident, or any description by an insurance officer of the medical consequences of the relevant accident in his reference to a medical board of the case of a claimant for disablement benefit, should deprive the medical authorities of their exclusive jurisdiction and duty under s 36 (1) (c) to determine what loss of faculty has resulted from the relevant accident at the time of a claim for disablement benefit. If this means that there may be cases in which there are conflicting findings of fact by statutory authorities and medical authorities in claims for different kinds of benefit arising out of the same accident, it is a regrettable but inevitable consequence of a scheme whereby the medical consequences of an accident are decided by different decision-making authorities according to the kind of benefit claimed.

There remains the last question: ought *Dowling's case*¹² to be overruled or followed or distinguished? Your Lordships are all agreed that it ought not to be distinguished. Hitherto it has been found possible to limit its application to cases where an accident results in a single injury not susceptible of further diagnosis into more than one injury and occurring as the result, not of some fortuitous incident but in the course of doing the ordinary work that the claimant was employed to do. This has been done up until now by regarding the reasoning of Lord Hodson in *Dowling's case*¹² as being the same

a as that of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest. But the closer analysis to which Lord Hodson's speech has been subjected in the instant appeals makes it impossible to continue so to limit it without intellectual dishonesty.

Ought this House, then, to follow it notwithstanding that the majority of your Lordships who have heard the instant appeals think that it is wrong? It is a recent decision, but I see no greater reason for perpetuating recent error than for leaving b ancient error uncorrected. In view of the limited application which has been given to *Dowling's case*¹³ in practice, to overrule it is unlikely to defeat the expectations of any appreciable number of claimants for injury benefit whose accidents have already occurred. But to give it the wider application which must now be recognised as attributable to it may have fortuitous and arbitrary consequences of the kind to which Viscount Dilhorne has drawn attention, in any future claim for disablement benefit for an internal injury, particularly an injury to heart or back or a hernia.

c These consequences, which cannot have been intended by Parliament, could be averted by amending legislation. But it would be unrealistic to suppose that this could be done quickly. The immense volume of cases which would require to be decided in the meantime, the pressure under which insurance officers must work if injury benefit is to be paid timeously, the burden which would fall on medical boards
d of ascertaining whether an insurance officer had at some time previously expressly or inferentially made a finding as to the medical results of the relevant accident, the invidious position in which members of medical authorities would be placed if bound to accept for the purposes of their assessment of the degree of disablement statements of medical opinion which they themselves knew to be unjustified; considerations such as these would persuade me that the right course in the public interest would be to overrule *Dowling's case*¹³ notwithstanding that it is a decision on the construction
e of a statute which after some delay could be put right by Parliamentary action. I should myself, therefore, overrule *Dowling's case*¹³ and dismiss both of these appeals.

But although the majority of your Lordships are of the firm opinion that the ratio decidendi in *Dowling's case*¹³ was wrong only a minority of three are prepared to overrule it. This a minority has no power to do. If then Lord Hodson's speech
f in *Dowling's case*¹³ must still be treated as expounding the true meaning of the statute I see no escape from the conclusion that it governs the appellant Jones's appeal and I think it would be unjust to the appellant Hudson to reach a contrary conclusion in his appeal. So I agree reluctantly that both appeals must be allowed.

Since writing my speech, I have had the advantage of reading the afterthoughts of my noble and learned friend, Lord Simon of Glaisdale, on the possibility of introducing into this country the practice of prospective overruling which is currently
g being developed by courts in the United States of America. The question whether the common law recognises such a power in your Lordships' House when acting as an appellate court of last resort was not touched on in the course of the hearing. Accordingly, I do not think it appropriate to do more than to express my concurrence with my noble and learned friend's suggestion that it is a topic which deserves consideration
h in a subsequent case in which the relevant decisions of federal and state courts in the United States can be examined.

LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, my noble and learned friends have acquainted your Lordships with the details of the statutory scheme and of the facts of the two cases under appeal; and I presume to take advantage of their narration, only referring in due course to the points of particular significance to the argument which I venture to submit to your Lordships. I propose to submit that
j argument within the following framework:

(1) The ratio decidendi in *Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union (Re Dowling)*¹³

(2) Independent construction of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946, i.e. the construction which impresses me independently of authority. I shall consider this problem under three heads: (a) structural or functional; (b) linguistic; (c) general. a

(3) The problem of distinguishing *Dowling's case*¹⁴. I propose to consider the question under four heads: (a) the approach of the Divisional Court¹⁵ and the Court of Appeal¹⁶; (b) is the appellant Jones's case on its facts distinguishable from *Dowling's case*¹⁴? (c) is the appellant Hudson's case on its facts distinguishable from *Dowling's case*¹⁴? (d) if either is distinguishable, should it be distinguished? b

(4) Should *Dowling's case*¹⁴ be overruled?

(5) The 'onus of proof'.

(6) The final consequences of the foregoing considerations on the two appeals. c

(7) Some afterthoughts.

I shall refer throughout to the provisions of the 1946 Act, which (as amended in 1953) governs the appellant Jones's case, adding in brackets after each first reference a reference to the corresponding provision of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1965, which technically governs part of the appellant Hudson's case, but which was a consolidation statute. I shall for convenience refer to 'the statutory authorities' and 'the medical authorities' to denote respectively the channels insurance officer/local appeal tribunal/commissioner and medical board/medical appeal tribunal/commissioner. Italics throughout are my own. d

*The ratio decidendi of Dowling's case*¹⁴.

As I read the judgment of the majority in *Dowling's case*¹⁴, it established the three following propositions: (1) a decision of the statutory authorities on any material matter which is within their jurisdiction is 'final' (at least, when there has been no prior inconsistent decision of the medical authorities on a material matter within their jurisdiction); (2) 'final' here means 'conclusive for all purposes under the Act', and not merely 'conclusive for the purposes of the particular claim which is being dealt with'; (3) a decision of the medical authorities which is inconsistent with a prior decision of the statutory authorities which is so 'final' is a nullity¹⁷. It is, in my view, implicit in the majority judgment that a decision of the medical authorities on any matter within their jurisdiction is similarly 'final' in the absence of a prior inconsistent decision of the statutory authorities. e

I think that my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, concurred with the majority in the conclusion of the appeal on a quite independent approach, which did not depend on the statutory provision for 'finality', but which turned on the concept that cases where the accident and the injury are identical are special cases, in which the medical authorities would be destroying the basis of their own jurisdiction if they failed to accept a prior decision of the statutory authorities. I find little, if any, reflection of this viewpoint in the judgment of the majority, which was, I think, of general application. This difference of approach between that of the majority in *Dowling's case*¹⁴ and that of my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, seems to me to be of importance, since it was on the basis of the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, that the Divisional Court¹⁵ and the Court of Appeal¹⁶ distinguished the instant cases from *Dowling's case*¹⁴. f

I accept that, contrary to what has sometimes been urged in the past, it is impossible to separate the statutory scheme out neatly so that medical matters fall for determination by the medical authorities while all others fall for determination either by the Minister or the statutory authorities. But the fundamental impression that the h a scheme of the Act makes on me is that (leaving aside death benefit) there are certain basic differences between injury benefit on the one hand, and disablement benefit on the other—in purpose, in scope, and therefore in machinery—and that these differences are the key to the interpretation of the Act. Injury benefit is temporary only; its call on public funds is limited; it should be rapidly available to the injured employee. Disablement benefit, on the other hand, is potentially of much longer duration (indeed, potentially lifelong); it is therefore liable to involve a greater call b on public funds; and there is less urgency in its assessment. Moreover, assessment of loss of faculty and of degree and likely period of disablement, which are relevant only to disablement benefit, are peculiarly subjects for medical judgment.

It is by reason of these differences between the purposes, necessities, scopes, implications and consequences of injury benefit and disablement benefit respectively that c the medical authorities are concerned, and only concerned, with disablement benefit. The statutory authorities must resolve such medical problems as arise on matters other than claims for disablement benefit as best they may, invoking such medical counsel as is necessary and available and practicable. But it in no way follows that the medical authorities are absolved from performing their own statutory functions in relation to claims for disablement benefit. Those statutory functions—to decide d whether the relevant accident has resulted in a loss of faculty and to assess the extent and likely duration of disablement resulting from a loss of faculty—are laid down in s 36 (1) (c) (1965, s 37). They cannot be performed if the medical authorities are bound by a previous decision of a statutory authority, which the medical authorities may believe—perhaps even, by clinical examination, may know—to be wrong.

I would add that so to bind the medical authorities could operate equally against a claimant as in his favour; and that, in any case, the taxpayer too is entitled to have his e interest considered. I would also add that the construction put on the statute in *Dowling's case*¹⁸ involves, in effect, importing the concept of issue estoppel into the administrative law of industrial injury insurance. This seems to me to be singularly inappropriate. Moreover, it will be quite capricious and fortuitous which 'gets in f first'—a statutory or a medical authority—so as to make a finding which is conclusive on the other. The appellant Hudson's case itself provides an instance of the complexities and difficulties that can be involved.

There is yet another structural indication that the medical authorities are autonomous within their own sphere. By s 36 (1) (c) (i) the medical authorities are to determine whether the relevant accident has resulted in any loss of faculty. By s 4 (3) of the 1953 Act a decision that the relevant accident has not resulted in a loss of faculty is to be reviewable by the machinery, and subject to the conditions, of review of the g decisions of the medical authorities (s 40; 1965, s 40): these differ materially from the machinery and conditions of review of decisions of the statutory authorities (see s 50; 1965, s 49).

Construction of the Act: linguistic

h It must be rare for linguistic analysis of an elaborate Act of Parliament to be conclusive—even when the drafting inspires confidence, as (I hope I may say without seeming presumptuous) that of the statute in question does with me. But in the instant case linguistic examination peculiarly and powerfully reinforces the impression which I get from a functional structural analysis.

The crucial linguistic problem is the meaning of the word 'final' in s 36 (3) (1965, s 50 (1)). The same word is used in s 37 (5) (1965, s 35 (3) invoking National Insurance j Act 1965, s 65 (7)), where it undoubtedly means 'without further appeal'. On the other hand, 'final' in s 36 (3) stands in discrepancy with s 49 (1965, s 48) (declarations that an accident is an industrial accident): in sub-s (4) of each section the words are 'conclusive for the purposes of any claim for benefit in respect of that accident . . .' It also stands in discrepancy with s 72 (1965, s 70) (decisions in any proceedings for an offence under the Act or involving any question as to the payment of contributions under the Act or for the recovery of any sum due to the Industrial Injuries Fund), s 72 (1) providing that—

‘the decision of the Minister on any question which under this Act is required to be determined by him subject to an appeal on a question of law to the High Court shall, unless such an appeal is pending or the time for so appealing has not expired, be conclusive for the purpose of those proceedings.’

(The wording of the 1965 Act is not materially different; and the italicised words are identical). Similar language is used in s 72 (2) (nothing corresponding in the 1965 Act); whereas s 72 (4) (1965, s 70 (3)) provides for an adjournment of proceedings ‘until such time as a final decision on the question has been obtained’—where ‘final’ seems again to mean ‘not subject to further appeal’. I find it impossible to believe that such discrepancy in terminology was other than advertent on the part of the draftsman—indeed, it seems to me essentially the sort of detail which he would be bound to discuss with and explain to officials in the course of preparation of the Bill leading to the Act.

If the foregoing is correct, it follows that ‘final’ in s 36 (3) must mean something other than ‘conclusive for the purposes of any claim for benefit in respect of that accident’. It could mean either or both of two things: (1) ‘not subject to appeal or review “except as provided by this part of this Act”’ (opening words of s 36 (3)); (2) that an employee is not to be deprived of injury benefit (either prospectively or retrospectively) merely because a decision of a question arising in connection therewith conflicts with a subsequent decision on a question arising in connection with a claim for disablement benefit. Although ‘final’ in s 36 (3) could, merely on linguistic analysis, mean either of these things alone, I think that the structural/functional analysis determines that it means both. *Inland Revenue Comrs v Brooks*¹⁹, although turning on the construction of a very different sort of statute, shows that the word ‘final’ in an Act of Parliament is quite capable of bearing simultaneously both these meanings and no other (in particular, not ‘conclusive for all statutory purposes’).

This construction is, in my view, borne out by s 36 (2) (cf 1965, ss 37, 43, 50 (1)). It starts with the words ‘Subject to the foregoing provisions of this section’. The effect of that is that the sphere of the statutory authorities’ determination is what is left after the subtraction of ‘special questions’, which include the questions in s 36 (1) (c) that are to be determined by the medical authorities. This delimitation of the sphere of determination of the statutory authorities makes it impossible that their decisions should in any way bind the medical authorities, and is only consistent with ‘final’ meaning something less than ‘conclusive for the purpose of any claim under this Act’.

In view of the opinion I have formed on the meaning of the word ‘final’ in s 36 (3), it is unnecessary for me to come to any conclusion on the meaning of the word ‘question’ in that subsection. I merely summarise my view in deference to the extensive arguments—that the meaning which seems best to fit the subsection is a wide one, namely, ‘any matter which calls for an answer in order for a statutory requirement to be satisfied’.

I venture also to interpolate at this stage my conception of the meaning of certain other crucial terms used in the statute—‘accident’, ‘injury’, ‘loss of faculty’, ‘disability’, ‘disablement’. (In addition, two further terms have figured in the argument—‘incident’ (also used in the statutory forms) and ‘symptom’.) None of these terms is the subject of statutory definition; and this suggests to me that they are used in their ordinary senses, and convinces me that any attempt at judicial definition would be inappropriate. It was suggested in argument that various of these terms were interchangeable—especially incident/accident, accident/injury and loss of faculty/

- a disability. Although in particular cases the concepts may overlap, the statute envisages them as separate—in order for ‘disablement’ benefit to be payable, the ‘accident’ must result in ‘injury’, which must result in ‘loss of faculty’, which must result in ‘disability’: see s 7 (1965, s 5); s 12 (1) as amended by 1953, s 3 (1) (1965, s 12); and *R v Industrial Injuries Comr, ex parte Cable*²⁰. Without, as I say, attempting definition, my understanding of the terminology is as follows: ‘Incident’ is some thing which happens in a way remarkable to sensory perception in a mentally separable period of time. ‘Accident’ is an untoward incident, or a mishap. ‘Injury’ is hurt to body or mind. ‘Symptom’ is indication of injury apparent on clinical examination. ‘Loss of faculty’ is impairment of the proper functioning of part of the body or mind. ‘Disability’ is partial or total failure of power to perform normal bodily or mental processes. ‘Disablement’ is the sum of disabilities, which, by contrast with the powers of a normal person, can be expressed as a percentage.

c Construction of the Act: general

I have tried to set out independently the matters, functional and linguistic, which strike me most forcibly in attempting the interpretation of the statute. But I would add that I find myself convinced by the entire argument of my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, in *Dowling’s case*¹.

- d *Distinguishing Dowling’s case*¹: the approach of the Divisional Court² and Court of Appeal³

The Divisional Court² and the Court of Appeal³ distinguished *Dowling’s case*¹ from the cases under instant appeal on the ground that in *Dowling’s case*¹ there was a single injury which itself constituted the accident, whereas in each of the cases under instant appeal the statutory authority had found two injuries, either of which would have justified the issue of injury benefit: the medical authorities could therefore conclude that only one of those injuries was, for the purpose of disablement benefit, the result of the accident, without thereby contradicting the conclusion of the statutory authority that injury benefit was payable, or (to put it another way) destroying the basis of their own jurisdiction. No other ground of distinction has been suggested.

- f *Is the appellant Jones’s case distinguishable from Dowling’s case*¹?

In my view, the crux of the appellant Jones’s case lies in ‘the finding [of the local appeal tribunal] on questions of fact material to decision’ of 6th November 1964 allowing the appellant Jones’s appeal from the refusal of the insurance officer to permit the issue of injury benefit to him. These findings were expressed as follows:

- g ‘Satisfied that appellant had no previous history of cardiac infarction and that the symptoms noticed shortly after the accident were in fact those of Infarction though not recognised as such, also that the work he was engaged on at the time was exceptionally heavy for him as a fitter.’

- h The matter is placed beyond doubt by the written information supplied by the national insurance office to the medical board. In the heading ‘Description of incident accepted as the industrial accident’ the word ‘accepted’ was underlined in ink; and thereunder was written ‘Whilst lifting a buffer on to wagon he sustained a myocardial infarction’. ‘Accepted’ here must mean ‘accepted by the insurance officer on the basis of the finding of the local appeal tribunal of 6th November 1964’. In other words, the statutory authorities had found that ‘the relevant accident’ was over-exertion while lifting a buffer and ‘the relevant injury’ was a myocardial infarction.
- j This was the basis on which injury benefit was issued. The finding of the medical board that myocardial infarction, though present, was an 'unconnected condition', and their consequent refusal to find that the ascertained loss of faculty or disablement due to myocardial infarction was the result of the relevant accident, were inconsistent with the decision of the local appeal tribunal which was the basis for the issue of injury benefit to the appellant Jones. The appellant Jones's case is therefore a 'single injury' (or 'accident/injury') case, and is in my view indistinguishable from *Dowling's case*⁴.

The facts are far from simple. On 4th October 1965 the insurance officer made a declaration under s 49 (1965, s 48) that the appellant Hudson had sustained an industrial accident. A number of questions arise from this. First, did the declaration involve a finding of 'injury by accident'? Answer, clearly, Yes; these are the very words used in s 49 (2). Secondly, did it find a specific injury? Answer, Yes, hernia; because that was the injury which the appellant Hudson claimed that he had sustained. Thirdly, was it 'conclusive' that the accident resulted in hernia? Answer, Yes, provided *Dowling's case*⁴ stands as good law. Fourthly, was it conclusive that the accident resulted exclusively in hernia? Answer, No; because the declaration made no such finding expressly, nor was such a finding necessary.

On 20th December 1965 the medical board had to perform its statutory function in relation to the appellant Hudson's claim for disablement benefit, no claim for injury benefit having yet been made. The medical board found a right inguinal hernia as a fully relevant condition (i.e. resulting from 'the relevant accident'). So far, in accord with the insurance officer's declaration of 4th October 1965. They recorded myocardial infarction as an 'unconnected condition'; but their 'Remarks' thereon were as follows:

'The board discussed this case as his heart attack occurred the day of the rupture when he had been subjected to considerable strain which might also be the cause of his heart lesion but this is made unconnected as no claim has been made ...'

This means that the medical board had found that the myocardial infarction was not 'connected with' the relevant accident because the appellant Hudson had not formally and in terms claimed it to be so. It is common ground that the medical board thus proceeded erroneously in law; although 'connected with' is the term used in the form, and is not the statutory term, which is 'the result of'. It is, however, argued for the respondent that the medical board, however erroneously in law, came to the conclusion that the myocardial infarction did not result from the relevant accident. If they had, their finding would not have conflicted with the declaration of the insurance officer of 4th October 1965 (because he had found only hernia as 'the injury by accident') but (if *Dowling's case*⁴ stands, and if it has, as I think, implicit in it the concept that 'finality/conclusiveness' operates both ways between the statutory and medical authorities) their finding would have subsequently been conclusive on the statutory authorities that myocardial infarction was not the result of the relevant accident. But I do not think that the medical board did make any finding that the myocardial infarction was not the result of the relevant accident. On the contrary, I think the medical board advisedly refrained from coming to any such conclusion; but instead 'made it unconnected' (again not a statutory term) because they, wrongly, thought they were obliged to do so. They did not, in my view, come to any decision whether or not the accident resulted in a myocardial infarction, whether regarded as loss of faculty or disability or disablement (the only matters with which the medical board was concerned).

However, the insurance officer understandably took the medical board as indicating a medical opinion that the myocardial infarction was the result of the accident. In a consequence, on 5th August 1966, the insurance officer allowed the issue of injury benefit to the appellant Hudson. That the myocardial infarction was 'the relevant injury' for the purpose of this issue of injury benefit is apparent from a passage from the 'Minister's observations' dated 3rd August 1966:

b 'He was incapacitated for work from 19.1.65 to 19.4.65 by reasons of "Chest pain", "Myocardial infarct" [sic] and "coronary thrombosis" and injury benefit has now been allowed for the period from 19.1.65 to 19.4.65.'

As I have indicated, there was no prior decision to the contrary which precluded the insurance officer from allowing the issue of injury benefit on the basis of the relevant injury being myocardial infarction.

c The appellant Hudson appealed from the medical board to the medical appeal tribunal (presumably because he was dissatisfied that the medical board, in considering the myocardial infarction, had 'made it unconnected'). The medical appeal tribunal in effect rejected the appellant Hudson's appeal; their 'Reasons for decision, including findings on all material questions of fact' were:

'Exertion being of itself no precipitating factor in myocardial infarction, we can find nothing in this case to associate that condition with the relevant accident.'

d They assessed disablement in respect of the hernia at 3 per cent.

e It follows that the appellant Hudson's case does differ from *Dowling's case*⁵ in being a case of more than one injury found by the statutory authorities, i.e. hernia found by the insurance officer for the purpose of the industrial injury declaration and myocardial infarction found by the insurance officer for the purpose of injury benefit. If, therefore, the ground of distinction drawn by the Divisional Court⁶ and the Court of Appeal⁷—namely, between 'single injury' (or 'accident/injury') and multiple injury cases—is valid, the appellant Hudson's case is distinguishable from *Dowling's case*⁵. It is therefore now for consideration whether this is a valid ground of distinction.

*Should the appellant Hudson's case be distinguished from Dowling's case?*⁵

f The argument that I felt of greatest weight in favour of distinguishing between the 'single injury' (or 'accident/injury') case and that of multiple injury rests on the assertion, put forward on behalf of the respondent, that the statutory scheme has been found to work on the basis of *Dowling's case*⁵, but that to follow *Dowling's case*⁵ from the 'single injury' (or accident/injury) case into that of multiple injury would involve an extension of *Dowling's case*⁵ which would be harmful to the administration of the scheme. But it was argued in *Dowling's case*⁵ that the decision which this House ultimately came to would seriously hinder administration; yet it is now admitted that the wolf that was then so vociferously apprehended did not in fact turn up to mangle the scheme. In these circumstances I am the less ready to listen to fresh cries, particularly when warnings of administrative confusion rest on bare assertion. It might, however, be urged, secondly, that if *Dowling's case*⁵ turns on a construction of the Act which no longer commends itself, it should be as narrowly confined as possible. However that may be, in my judgment the arguments against distinguishing *Dowling's case*⁵ are overwhelming.

h In the first place, to distinguish *Dowling's case*⁵ in the manner suggested runs counter to the scheme of the Act by treating as a juristically separate category cases where 'the injury is the accident', whereas the Act envisages the concepts of accident and injury as distinct, the injury as resulting from the accident. It is therefore only in a loose sense that one can speak of the injury being the accident. Secondly, the suggested distinction would produce highly artificial distinctions and extremely capricious results, dependent not only on whether the statutory authorities or the medical authorities 'get in first' but also on the exact way the insurance officer frames his findings or on whether some (possibly miniscule) secondary injury can be spelt out of the accident. As I understand it, it was partly to obviate such refinement in distinction and such capriciousness in result that the declaration of 26th July 1966⁸ was made. Thirdly, it is arguable that there is, strictly speaking, no such thing as a 'single injury': e.g. even a cut finger could involve laceration of skin, flesh, muscle, tendon and nerve; here would lie a further fruitful source of refinement and caprice. Fourthly, the suggested ground of distinction relies on the reasoning and the language of the judgment of my noble and learned friend, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, in *Dowling's case*⁹; and I have ventured to point out that this differs from the judgment of the majority of the House. It would be absurd, at least so far as I myself am concerned, to distinguish, and thus affirm within its own sphere, *Dowling's case*⁹, on a basis that neither finds support in the ratio decidendi of the majority nor accords with the construction that I have ventured to favour. In my view, therefore, the choice lies between following or overruling *Dowling's case*⁹.

Should Dowling's case⁹ be overruled?

I have already indicated that, if the matter were res integra, I would presume to put a different construction on the Act than that which commended itself to the majority of the House in *Dowling's case*⁹. Nevertheless, I am clearly of opinion that it would be wrong now to seek to depart from that decision, for the following reasons:

(1) The declaration of 26th July 1966⁸ itself implies that the power to depart from a previous decision of your Lordships' House is one to be most sparingly exercised.

(2) A variation of view on a matter of statutory construction—so much a matter of impression—would, I should have thought, rarely provide a suitable occasion, by itself, that is to say, for it would be different if it were convincingly shown that a previous construction, clearly demonstrated to be wrong, was causing administrative difficulties or individual injustice.

(3) Your Lordships will, I apprehend, be reluctant to encourage frequent litigants before your Lordships' House—like the Secretary of State for Social Services in this type of case or the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in revenue cases—to endeavour to re-open arguments once concluded against them—particularly since appellate committees do not sit in banc, so that similar arguments might be put forward in successive cases in the hope of finding a favourably constituted committee. (It was claimed on behalf of the respondent that it was of importance, in this connection, that *Inland Revenue Comrs v Brooks*¹⁰ was not drawn to the attention of the House in *Dowling's case*⁹; but, in my view, *Inland Revenue Comrs v Brooks*¹⁰, although useful, is only of marginal significance, since it turned on the construction of words of a particular statute of a very different character from those your Lordships are now considering. I would also apply in this context what Lord Shaw said in a different one in *Hoystead v Taxation Comr*¹¹:

'Parties are not permitted to begin fresh litigations because of new views they may entertain of the law of the case, or new versions which they present as to what should be a proper apprehension by the Court of the legal result . . . If this were permitted litigation would have no end, except when legal ingenuity is exhausted.')

(4) On the instant issue there is obviously much to be said for each side; one has only to consider the speeches with which your Lordships have already been favoured.

a Although I have myself come to a clear conclusion one way, I recognise the strength of the counter-arguments. In particular, there are four powerful contra-indications on the all-important structural/functional approach: (a) if one starts with what will after all be the typical case of the insurance officer deciding 'the gateway question' the scheme of the Act will make an entirely different impression; (b) conclusiveness is of special value in disputes falling within administrative jurisprudence; (c) conflicting decisions on medical matters may lead an unsuccessful claimant for disablement benefit to feel a sense of ill-usage; (d) the superior apparatus for review of decisions by the statutory authorities (who will generally 'get in first') is an argument for giving the decisions of those authorities a force overriding those of the medical authorities; in particular, it seems to be a defect that there can be no medical review in the light of a change in dominant medical opinion—perhaps by reason of a new discovery.

c (5) As I have indicated, despite dire prophecy the decision in *Dowling's case*¹² has not rendered the statutory scheme unworkable; nor have I myself been convinced that this would be its effect if it were extended from 'accident/injury' (or 'single injury') cases. It was argued that the medical authorities might be left in doubt as to the relevant injury found by the insurance officer as a basis for the issue of injury benefit; but such cases will be rare, especially in view of the fact that the insurance officer can be required to give his reasons for disallowing a claim, so that his medical finding(s) will, in difficult cases, generally be apparent to the medical authorities on the face of the record.

d (6) If *Dowling's case*¹² really causes inconvenience, it seems to me that the remedy lies far more appropriately with the legislature than in your Lordships' House sitting judicially. Parliament has facilities for advice (both from the executive and from industry) as to all possible repercussions, which your Lordships do not have; and, in particular, the statutory review procedure may need reconsideration in any new context.

e (7) In 1969 there were two statutes amending the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1965; and certainly one of those would seem to have provided an opportunity to modify the rule in *Dowling's case*¹² if this had been necessary. The Minister having failed to take that parliamentary opportunity, he should not, in my view, be encouraged to invite us now to take this step, with our far more limited knowledge.

f (8) One of the bases of the declaration of 26th July 1966¹³ was that the following of precedent 'may lead to injustice in a particular case'. I am not merely unconvinced that the following of *Dowling's case*¹² would lead to injustice in the cases under instant appeal: I think there is some indication to the contrary. The medical evidence available in these cases and in others to which your Lordships' attention has been drawn shows that there has been a conflict of medical opinion whether exertion can result in myocardial infarction; and it also indicates, so far as I can judge, a shift in preponderant medical opinion from a negative to an affirmative view in the matter. I cannot but feel that it would be hard on the appellants if *Dowling's case*¹² were overruled in such a way as to saddle them with an expression of, it may be, temporarily adverse medical opinion.

g (9) I am left uncertain what would be the effect of overruling *Dowling's case*¹² on decisions thereafter come to on the basis that it was correctly decided. Before departing from a previous decision, your Lordships, I surmise, would require to be positively satisfied that such a course would not involve unacceptably the re-opening of issues long concluded or the risk of individual hardship in cases intermediately decided (and I do not limit my observations to the possible liability for the repayment, but extend them to adjustment of life on the basis of a decision).

The 'onus of proof'

On this matter I find myself completely in agreement with the judgments in the Divisional Court¹⁴ and the Court of Appeal¹⁵; and I should merely be presuming on your Lordships' patience if I tried to express my views in my own words, inevitably less felicitous.

Conclusion on the appeals

To sum up, in my view the appellant Jones's appeal is covered directly by Dowling's case¹⁶, which should, in my judgment, be followed; while the appellant Hudson's case should not be distinguished from Dowling's case¹⁶, which should again be followed. I would therefore allow both appeals.

Afterthoughts

I am left with the feeling that, theoretically, in some ways the most satisfactory outcome of these appeals would have been to have allowed them on the basis that they were governed by the decision in Dowling's case¹⁶, but to have overruled that decision prospectively. Such a power—to overrule prospectively a previous decision, but so as not necessarily to affect the parties before the court—is exercisable by the Supreme Court of the United States, which has held it to be based on the common law: see *Linkletter v Walker*¹⁷.

In this country it was long considered that judges were not makers of law but merely its discoverers and expounders. The theory was that every case was governed by a relevant rule of law, existing somewhere and discoverable somehow, provided sufficient learning and intellectual rigour were brought to bear. But once such a rule had been discovered, frequently the pretence was tacitly dropped that the rule was pre-existing; for example, cases like *Shelley's Case*¹⁸, *Merryweather v Nixan*¹⁹ or *Priestley v Fowler*²⁰ were (rightly) regarded as new departures in the law. Nevertheless the theory, however unreal, had its value—in limiting the sphere of lawmaking by the judiciary (inevitably at some disadvantage in assessing the potential repercussions of any decision, and increasingly so in a complex modern industrial society), and thus also in emphasising that central feature of our constitution, the sovereignty of Parliament. But the true, even if limited, nature of judicial lawmaking has been more widely acknowledged of recent years; and the declaration of 26th July 1966¹ may be partly regarded as of a piece with that process. It might be argued that a further step to invest your Lordships with the ampler and more flexible powers of the Supreme Court of the United States would be no more than a logical extension of present realities and of powers already claimed without evoking objection from other organs of the constitution. But my own view is that, although such extension should be seriously considered, it would preferably be the subject-matter of Parliamentary enactment. In the first place, informed professional opinion is probably to the effect that your Lordships have no power to overrule decisions with prospective effect only; such opinion is itself a source of law; and your Lordships, sitting judicially, are bound by any rule of law arising extra-judicially. Secondly, to proceed by Act of Parliament would obviate any suspicion of endeavouring to upset one-sidedly the constitutional balance between executive, legislature and judiciary. Thirdly, concomitant problems could receive consideration—for example, whether other courts supreme within their own jurisdictions should have similar powers as regards the

- The taxpayer company had an issued share capital of £10,000 divided into 10,000 shares of £1 each. The shares were issued as to 200 to M and as to 4,900 each to J and C who were M's sons. M, J and C were the original directors but none was a whole-time service director. The taxpayer company purchased property costing f nearly £66,000 with the assistance of loans from its bankers (guaranteed by M) and from M. M died on 11th July 1965 and the three executors named in the will were a solicitor and J and C. At the date of his death the taxpayer company owed M £27,500, but later the executors repaid the bank loans and the taxpayer company then owed the estate of M a total of £57,500. During the accounting period 6th April 1966 to 25th March 1967 the taxpayer company paid M's estate £1,827 in yearly interest.
g During that period M's shares in the taxpayer company had not been transferred into the names of the executors and the administration of M's estate had not been completed. On 9th January 1967 J ceased to be a director of the taxpayer company and in August 1967 his shareholding was sold to C. The taxpayer company was assessed to corporation tax for the accounting period 6th April 1966 to 25th March 1967. During that accounting period the taxpayer company was a close company and h J and C were 'participators' within para 4 of Sch 18 to the Finance Act 1965. The taxpayer company claimed that the yearly interest paid by it to the executors was a 'charge on income' and, therefore, an allowable deduction against the total profits of the taxpayer company by virtue of s 52 (1)^a. The Crown contended that the yearly interest was a 'distribution of the company' within the meaning of para 9 (1) of

- j a Section 52, so far as material, provides: '(1) In computing the corporation tax chargeable for any accounting period of a company any charges on income paid by the company in the accounting period (but not before the year 1966-67), so far as paid out of the company's profits brought into charge to corporation tax, shall be allowed as deductions against the total profits for the period as reduced by any other relief from tax. (2) Subject to the following subsections, "charges on income" means for the purposes of corporation tax

Sch 11^b and therefore excluded, under s 52 (2), from being a charge on income, on the basis that the executors were, within para 5 (b) and (c) of Sch 18^c, associates in relation to the participator C. a

Held – (i) The yearly interest was not prevented from being a charge on income on account of para 5 (b) which could not apply, since a will was not, for the purposes of the statutory definition of settlement, a ‘disposition’ (see p 207 j and p 208 b and j, post). Inland Revenue Comrs v Buchanan [1957] 2 All ER 400 applied; further even if a will could be a disposition (i.e. ‘provision in an instrument which deals with particular property’), personal representatives of an estate which was still in course of administration could not be said to be the ‘trustees of any settlement’ within the meaning of para 5 (b) (see p 208 e to j, post). b

(ii) The yearly interest was however prevented as a distribution from being an allowable deduction as a charge on income because the executors were within the meaning of para 5 (c) ‘interested’ in M’s shares; in that paragraph the word ‘interested’ covered both fiduciary and beneficial interests and there was no difference in that context between trustees and executors who had not yet completed the administration and who accordingly had the whole right of property (see p 209 h and p 210 b and c, post). c

- b 1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on 24th November 1969, Islington Green Investment Co ('the taxpayer company') appealed against an assessment to corporation tax for the accounting period 6th April 1966 to 25th March 1967 in the sum of £5,000.

- c 2. Shortly stated the question for the commissioners' decision was whether yearly interest amounting to £1,827 paid by the taxpayer company during the aforesaid accounting period to the estate of A H Michell, deceased, in the circumstances set out below was a charge on the income of the taxpayer company and allowable as a deduction against the total profits of the taxpayer company for the accounting period in accordance with s 52 of the Finance Act 1965 ('the Act').

- d 4. The following facts were admitted between the parties: (1) The taxpayer company was an unlimited private company incorporated on 19th January 1961 under the Companies Act 1948 with a nominal capital of £50,000 in 50,000 ordinary shares of £1 each. It was a property owning company and owned various freehold properties situated mainly in the Islington district of London. (2) The taxpayer company's issued capital comprised 10,000 shares of £1 each fully paid and originally was registered in the names of and beneficially owned by:

e	A H Michell	200 shares
	and his two sons:
	J F C Michell	4,900 shares
	C H W Michell	4,900 shares
		<hr/> 10,000 shares <hr/>

- f The aforementioned three shareholders were also the original directors of the taxpayer company. (3) A H Michell died on 11th July 1965, leaving a widow, his two sons and a daughter. Probate of his will dated 9th March 1961 was granted on 4th October 1965 to the three executors named therein, i.e. P M Armitage (a solicitor), J F C Michell and C H W Michell. (4) At the time of the appeal hearing A H Michell's shares in the taxpayer company had not been transferred into the names of the executors of his will, and the administration of his estate according to the will had not been completed. (5) J F C Michell retired from the board of directors of the taxpayer company on 9th January 1967 and his shareholding was sold to C H W Michell for full consideration in August 1967. At the time of the appeal hearing the shareholders were:

h	A H Michell, deceased	200 shares
	C H W Michell	9,799 shares
	P C B Pockney (nominee for C H W Michell)	1 share
		<hr/> 10,000 shares <hr/>

- j (6) To fill the vacancy on the taxpayer company's board of directors P C B Pockney was appointed a director on 9th January 1967 since which date he and C H W Michell continued to comprise the board of directors. (7) During the relevant accounting period the taxpayer company was a 'close company' within para 1 of Sch 18 to the Act, and C H W Michell and J F C Michell were 'participants', in relation to the company within para 4 of Sch 18. At no time had any director of the taxpayer company been a 'whole-time service director' of the company within para 6 (3) of

Sch 18. (8) The properties purchased by the taxpayer company cost a total of £65,982 and to date only one costing £7,797 had been sold. That disposal took place during the relevant accounting period, and the provisions of Part III of the Act (capital gains tax) were applied to the disposal. (9) In order to finance the purchase of the properties, loans were obtained by the taxpayer company from, inter alia, the taxpayer company's bankers (secured by deposit of title deeds and guaranteed by A H Michell) and from A H Michell. Interest had been paid regularly thereon, and at the time of his death on 11th July 1965 the taxpayer company owed A H Michell £27,500. Subsequently, in order to cancel the guarantees given to the bank by A H Michell the executors of his will repaid the bank loans so that at the date of the appeal hearing the taxpayer company owed the estate of A H Michell deceased £57,500. Interest had been paid to the executors regularly, and no formal security was held by them other than the title deeds relating to certain properties which were held by the taxpayer company's bankers to their order. (10) During the relevant accounting period yearly interest of £1,827 was paid to the estate of A H Michell deceased.

5. It was not in dispute that the aforementioned yearly interest of £1,827 consisted wholly of payments within s 52 (3) (a) of the Act.

6. It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer company: (1) that the yearly interest amounting to £1,827 satisfied the definition of 'charges on income' in s 52 (2); (2) that the amount of £1,827 should be allowed as a deduction against the total profits of the taxpayer company for the relevant accounting period in accordance with s 52 (1); (3) that the appeal should be allowed and the assessment be adjusted accordingly.

7. It was contended on behalf of the inspector of taxes: (1) (a) that for the purpose of para 5 (b) of Sch 18 to the Act the definition of 'settlement' included dispositions and trusts created under a will or on an intestacy; (b) that as A H Michell was an associate of C H W Michell (who was a director), under para 5 (a) of Sch 18, the trustees of the settlement created by the will of A H Michell were themselves associates of C H W Michell within the meaning of para 5 (b) of Sch 18. (2) (a) That for the purpose of para 5 (c) of Sch 18 the legal personal representatives and trustees of the will of A H Michell were persons 'interested in' shares the subject of a trust or forming part of the estate of a deceased person; they were therefore both 'participants' and 'associates' of each other; (b) that C H W Michell was a director of the taxpayer company, owned shares in his own right and was also 'interested in' the same shares as one of the legal personal representatives and trustees; the legal personal representatives and trustees were therefore 'associates' of C H W Michell. (3) That as the yearly interest on the money advanced was paid to associates of a director, who was also a participator, it was therefore a 'distribution' within the meaning of para 9 (1) (a) of Sch 11 to the Act and was not one of the 'charges on income' (as defined in s 52 (2) of the Act) which was allowable as a deduction against the total profits for the relevant accounting period under s 52 (1) of the Act. (4) That the appeal should fail and the assessment be determined accordingly.

9. The commissioners who heard the appeal took time to consider their decision and gave it in writing on 6th January 1970, as follows:

'1. The question for our decision in this appeal is whether payments amounting to £1,827 made by the [taxpayer company] to the executors of the will of A. H. Michell, deceased, during the accounting period 6th April, 1966 to 25th March, 1967, by way of yearly interest on loans is a charge on the [taxpayer company's] income and therefore allowable as a deduction against the [taxpayer company's] total profits for Corporation Tax purposes by virtue of Section 52 (1), Finance Act 1965. It is not disputed that the payments making up the £1,827 fall within one or more of the descriptions mentioned in paragraph (a) of Section 52 (3), and the question turns on whether the said amount of £1,827 falls within the definition of "charges on income" in Section 52 (2), as claimed by the [taxpayer company], or whether, as claimed by the Crown, it is caught by the words of exclusion in the said Section 52 (2) "not being . . . distributions of the company".

2. The [taxpayer company] was incorporated as an unlimited private company on 19th January, 1961. The original directors of the [taxpayer company] were A. H. Michell and his two sons J. F. C. Michell and C. H. W. Michell, and these three individuals also held the whole of the [taxpayer company's] issued share capital of 10,000 £1 shares, as follows—

A. H. Michell	200 shares
J. F. C. Michell	4,900 shares
C. H. W. Michell	4,900 shares
	<hr/>
	10,000

It is agreed that the [taxpayer company] is and was during the relevant accounting period a close company and that at no time has any of its directors been a whole-time service director.

3. Following the death of A. H. Michell on 11th July, 1965, J. F. C. Michell and C. H. W. Michell continued as the only two directors of the [taxpayer company] until 9th January, 1967, when J. F. C. Michell retired as a director and was succeeded by P. C. B. Pockney. Since that date C. H. W. Michell and P. C. B. Pockney have continued as the only two directors of the [taxpayer company].

4. The answer to the question we have to decide (see paragraph 1 above) depends upon the interpretation of certain provisions contained in the 11th and 18th Schedules to the Finance Act 1965. For Corporation Tax purposes "distribution" is defined, for close companies, by Part II, 11th Schedule, under Paragraph 9 (1) of which "distribution" includes inter alia, unless otherwise stated, "(a) any interest or other consideration paid or given by the company to a director who is not a whole-time service director, but is a participator, for the use of money advanced by any person, or to a person who is an associate of such a director for the use of money so advanced". Sub-paragraph (5) of the said Paragraph 9 provides that, in the said Paragraph, any reference to a participator includes an associate of a participator. "Participator" and "associate" are defined in Paragraphs 4 and 5 respectively in Part I of the 18th Schedule to the Finance Act 1965. "Participator" is there defined, in general, as, in relation to any company, a person having a share or interest in the capital or income of the company. "Associate" is there defined as meaning, in relation to a participator:—(a) a person in any of the following relationships to the participator, that is to say, husband or wife, parent or remoter forebear, child or remoter issue, brother or sister, and partner; (b) the trustee or trustees of any settlement in relation to which the participator is, or any such relative of his (living or dead) as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) above is or was, a settlor ("settlement" and "settlor" here having the same meaning as in Chapter III of Part XVIII of the Income Tax Act, 1952, and "relative" including a husband or wife); (c) where the participator is interested in any shares or obligations of the company which are subject to any trust or are part of the estate of a deceased person, any other person interested therein.

5. Probate of A. H. Michell's will was granted on 4th October, 1965, to P. M. Armitage, J. F. C. Michell and C. H. W. Michell, the executors named therein. The administration of the estate has not yet been completed, and the 200 shares in the [taxpayer company] which were originally registered in the name of

A. H. Michell continue to be so registered. J. F. C. Michell's shares in the [taxpayer company] were sold for full consideration to C. H. W. Michell in August 1967. a

'6. It is common ground that both J. F. C. Michell and C. H. W. Michell were participators, in relation to the [taxpayer company], throughout the relevant accounting period, that both are executors of the will of A. H. Michell, deceased, and are among the residuary legatees thereunder. The appeal was, for convenience, argued before us in relation to C. H. W. Michell (who was a director of the [taxpayer company] through the relevant accounting period) as a participator, and we adopt a similar course in the succeeding paragraphs of this decision. On this basis, the question we have to decide is whether the yearly interest paid by the [taxpayer company] to the executors was paid to an associate of C. H. W. Michell. b

'7. The Crown do not seek to contend that sub-paragraph (a) of Paragraph 5, 18th Schedule, applies and the question for our decision, therefore, falls to be resolved by considering whether sub-paragraph (b) or sub-paragraph (c) of paragraph 5 applies. c

'8. In relation to sub-paragraph (b), it is not admitted on behalf of the [taxpayer company] that the will of A. H. Michell, deceased is a settlement though it is not denied that, if it is a settlement, then it is a settlement in relation to which the participator's father (being "any such relative of [the participator] (living or dead) as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) of Paragraph 5) was a settlor. It is, however, contended on behalf of the [taxpayer company] that "trustee or trustees" in sub-paragraph (b) of Paragraph 5 is to be interpreted as meaning trustee or trustees in the full sense, that a distinction should be drawn between executors qua executors and executors qua trustees, that the executors of the will of A. H. Michell deceased will not become trustees until the administration of the deceased's estate has been completed, and that as it has not yet been completed the said executors were not at the material time an associate in relation to the participator C. H. W. Michell within sub-paragraph (b) of Paragraph 5. In support of these contentions we are referred to the cases of Re Ponder^d, and Re Cockburn (decd)^e. d

'9. On behalf of the Crown it is pointed out that Paragraph 5 of the 18th Schedule adopts the definition of "settlement" in Chapter III, Part XVIII, Income Tax Act, 1952—"any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement" (Section 411 (2)). As to "disposition", the Crown emphasise the wide meaning of the word and refer us to the case of Duke of Northumberland v A-G^f in support of the proposition that "disposition" can include trusts created under a will. As to "trust" the Crown invite our attention to the terms of Section 68 (17) and Section 69 (1) and (2), Trustee Act, 1925. The Crown contend that the meaning of "trustee or trustees" in Paragraph 5, 18th Schedule, should not be limited in the sense contended for on behalf of the [taxpayer company], that the fact that the administration of the estate of A. H. Michell, deceased, has not yet been completed is irrelevant and that the executors of the will of the said deceased are an associate of C. H. W. Michell within sub-paragraph (b) of Paragraph 5. e

'10. In relation to sub-paragraph (c) of the said Paragraph 5, it is contended for the [taxpayer company] that as the 200 shares in the [taxpayer company] held by A. H. Michell deceased, which are part of his estate, are still registered in his name and have not been transferred to the executors, neither the participator (C. H. W. Michell) nor the executors are "interested" therein. Further it is contended that the interest of an executor in any part of the estate of a deceased person is not a beneficial interest, and that a beneficial interest is what is required to be shown to exist if sub-paragraph (c) is to be satisfied. It follows, f it is contended for the [taxpayer company], that the executors are not an associate of C. H. W. Michell within the said sub-paragraph (c).

'11. The Crown contend that the said 200 shares are subject to a trust created by the will, and are part of the estate of the deceased, that "interested" in sub-paragraph (c) is not limited in meaning so as to refer only to a beneficial interest, that the participator (C. H. W. Michell) is "interested" in the said shares and that the executors are also "interested" in them. Accordingly, the Crown contend, the executors are an associate of the participator within sub-paragraph (c).

'12. We are referred to a number of cases concerning the meaning to be attached to "an interest" or "interested". Our attention was invited on behalf of the [taxpayer company] to, in particular, Lord Sudeley v A-G^g. On behalf of the Crown we were referred to, inter alia, Inland Revenue Comrs v Park Investments Ltd^h and in particular to the remarks of Danckwerts, L.J.:-

"I do not accept the argument that 'persons interested in any shares . . . which are subject to any trust' does not include trustees. The words, in my opinion, are exactly applicable to the position of a trustee who holds shares subject to a trust, and a trustee has an interest in such shares—a legal interest."

'13. After careful consideration of the arguments addressed to us and the cases to which we are referred, we have come to the conclusion that the contentions of the [taxpayer company] are to be preferred to those of the Crown.

'14. In regard to sub-paragraph (b) of Paragraph 5, 18th Schedule, we think that the decisions in Re Ponder^j, and Re Cockburn (decd)^k support the [taxpayer company's] argument that there is a distinction between executors qua executors and executors qua trustees, and that executors change into trustees when the administration of the deceased's estate is completed. It follows that, in our opinion, the administration of the estate of A. H. Michell deceased being not yet completed, the executors of his will have not yet assumed the functions of trustees to which they were appointed by the will and are not, and were not during the relevant accounting period, the trustees of a settlement within the said sub-paragraph (b). In view of our decision on this point it is unnecessary for us to reach a conclusion on the question whether the said will is a settlement.

'15. In regard to sub-paragraph (c) of Paragraph 5, 18th Schedule, we consider that the case of Lord Sudeley v A-G^g supports the [taxpayer company's] contention that C. H. W. Michell, as participator, is not "interested" in the 200 shares in the [taxpayer company] which are registered in the name of the deceased and form part of his estate. We have in mind in particular the opinions of Lord Halsbury L.C. and Lord Herschell, and especially the sentence in the latter opinion^l "I do not think that they have any estate, right, or interest, legal or equitable, in these New Zealand mortgages . . ." We hold accordingly that the participator C. H. W. Michell is not "interested" in the said 200 shares. In view of our finding on this point it is unnecessary for us to pronounce upon the question whether the executors are "interested" in the said shares. As however C. H. W. Michell is both the participator and one of the executors we record our view that it would not be inconsistent with our finding that the participator is not "interested" therein if it were held that the executors are "interested" therein; we do not think it is permissible, in interpreting and applying sub-paragraph (c), to proceed on the basis that C. H. W. Michell can be treated as playing two separate roles at once, as a participator in relation to the opening words of the sub-paragraph and as part of "any other person" in relation to the closing words thereof.

'16. The appeal accordingly succeeds. We hold that the executors of the will of A. H. Michell deceased were not during the relevant accounting period an associate of such a director as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) of Paragraph 9 (1), 11th Schedule, Finance Act, 1965, that the yearly interest paid by the [taxpayer company] to the said executors during the said accounting period was not a distribution of the [taxpayer company] but is within the definition of "charges on income" in Section 52 (2) of the said Act and is allowable as a deduction against the [taxpayer company's] total profits according to the terms of Section 52 (1) of the said Act. We leave figures to be agreed in the light of our decision.'

10. Figures were agreed between the parties and on 28th April 1970, the commissioners discharged the assessment accordingly (agreed balance of charges to be carried forward £154).

The Crown appealed by way of case stated to the High Court.

Cur adv vult

20th July. GOFF J read the following judgment. This is an appeal on a question of corporation tax, which was imposed by s 49 of the Finance Act 1965. By s 51 (1), the tax is assessed and charged on the full amount of the profits without any other deduction than is authorised by the Act. Then, by s 52 (1), there is an allowable deduction for charges on income, but by sub-s (2) of that section the expression 'charges on income', which is otherwise defined in sub-s (3), is made to exclude 'dividends or other distributions of the company'.

The question which the Special Commissioners had to determine and which has now come before me is whether certain yearly interest amounting to £1,827 paid by the taxpayer company to the estate, i.e. the executors, of one A H Michell, deceased, was a charge on the income of the taxpayer company and allowable as a deduction against the total profits of the taxpayer company. The case states in para 5 that it was not in dispute that the £1,827 consisted wholly of payments within s 52 (3) (a), and was therefore a charge on income, but the question is whether it was a distribution within sub-s (2) and so not allowable.

The facts are set out in detail in para 4 of the case, and I need not rehearse them fully here. It is sufficient to observe the following. A H Michell, deceased, had two sons (to whom, for ease of reference, I will refer as 'John' and 'Charles') each of whom was throughout the relevant accounting period a substantial shareholder in the taxpayer company, and therefore a participator within the meaning ascribed to that expression in para 4 (1) of Sch 18 to the Act. John afterwards sold and transferred his shares to Charles, but nothing turned on that. Charles was at all material times a director. The deceased father was the registered owner of 200 shares and, as was found in para 4 (4) of the case:

'At the time of the appeal hearing A. H. Michell's shares in the [taxpayer company] had not been transferred into the names of the executors of his said will, and the administration of his estate according to the said will had not been completed.'

The executors were a Mr Armitage, who was a solicitor and was not a shareholder or director of the taxpayer company, together with John and Charles. Further, it was found by para 4 (7) of the case:

'During the relevant accounting period the [taxpayer company] was a "close company" within paragraph 1 of Schedule 18 to the Act, and C. H. W. Michell [i.e. Charles] and J. F. C. Michell [i.e. John] were "participators", in relation to the [taxpayer company] within paragraph 4 of the said Schedule. At no time

- a has any director of the [taxpayer company] been a "whole-time service director" of the [taxpayer company] within paragraph 6 (3) of the said Schedule.'

On those findings, the extended meaning of 'distribution' in relation to a close company contained in para 9 (1) of Sch 11 applies. That, so far as material, provides as follows:

- b 'In relation to a close company "distribution" includes, unless otherwise stated,—(a) any interest or other consideration paid or given by the company to a director who is not a whole-time service director, but is a participator, for the use of money advanced by any person, or to a person who is an associate of such a director for the use of money so advanced . . .'

'Participator' is defined in para 4 (1) of Sch 18, but I need not further refer to that.

- c What is highly important, and almost the whole battleground, is para 5 of Sch 18, which I now read:

- d 'For purposes of the provisions of this Act relating to close companies including this Schedule, "associate" means, in relation to a participator,—(a) a person in any of the following relationships to the participator, that is to say, husband or wife, parent or remoter forebear, child or remoter issue, brother or sister, and partner; (b) the trustee or trustees of any settlement in relation to which the participator is, or any such relative of his (living or dead) as is mentioned in subparagraph (a) above is or was, a settlor ("settlement" and "settlor" here having the same meaning as in Chapter III of Part XVIII of the Income Tax Act 1952, and "relative" including a husband or wife); (c) where the participator is interested in any shares or obligations of the company which are subject to any trust or are part of the estate of a deceased person, any other person interested therein; and has a corresponding meaning in relation to a person other than a participator.'

The commissioners, in a reserved decision which is fully set out in para 9 of the case, upheld the taxpayer company's contention that the £1,827 was not a distribution within the meaning of the Act, and discharged the assessment accordingly.

- f It is common ground that Charles was a director who was not a whole-time service director but was a participator, and the Crown's case is that his two co-executors were associates, therefore the £1,827 was a distribution, and the commissioners ought so to have held. Actually, at all material times John was also a participator, but nothing turns on that. It is argued by the taxpayer company per contra as an answer in limine that the payment was a joint payment to the three executors and therefore was not on any showing a payment either to a participator or to associates. In other words, it is said that the disjunctive 'or' in the penultimate line of para 9 (1) of Sch 11 postulates two mutually exclusive alternatives. I cannot so read the words, even allowing for the strict construction which is required in a taxing statute. It would produce the manifest absurdity of excluding a payment made to a participator and his wife jointly.

- g h I must then look to see whether the two co-executors were associates of Charles, for which purpose I have to turn to para 5 of Sch 18. Para 5 (a) is not applicable, but the Crown rest their case on para 5 (b) and (c), which I have already read. So far as para 5 (b) is concerned, the first question is whether there is a settlement which throws me back to the definition of 'settlement' in s 411 (2) of the Income Tax Act 1952, which, so far as material, is in these words:

- j 'In this Chapter, "settlement" includes any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement . . .'

The Crown say that the will of A H Michell is a disposition. The taxpayer company do not dispute that a will may be a disposition, but they say it cannot be for present purposes because this statutory definition has been construed by the court as excluding a will. In support of this submission they rely on *Inland Revenue Comrs v Buchanan*¹. The decision there on that part of the case was actually on s 20 of the Finance Act 1943, and not on s 21 of the Finance Act 1936, sub-s (9) of which contained the definition now embodied in s 411 (2) of the 1952 Act. But that does not matter, because s 20 of the 1943 Act was ancillary to s 21 of the Act of 1936, and therefore the same definition was involved. The case cited clearly establishes the proposition for which the taxpayer company contend so far as Chapter 3 of Part 18 of the Income Tax Act 1952 is concerned, and indeed as counsel for the taxpayer company has himself pointed out such a conclusion was inevitable in the context. The Crown seeks to escape that way and says that in the 1965 Act the context is different, or at least that there is no such compelling context as Chapter 3 provided, and they invite me not to apply the decision in Buchanan's case². In my judgment, I cannot possibly do that in a taxing Act, even if it would be correct in any case, which I doubt. If the legislature has not said what it meant, that is unfortunate, but the words of para 5 (b) in this respect, whatever criticisms there may be of other parts of it, are definite and unambiguous. They are, "settlement" and "settlor" here having the same meaning as in Chapter III of Part XVIII of the Income Tax Act 1952'. I cannot possibly read that as meaning, 'shall be defined as those words respectively are defined in s 411 (2) of the Income Tax Act 1952, but shall not have the meaning which the court has construed those words to have, and which must, therefore, be taken to be their meaning in Chapter 3'.

That is sufficient to dispose of the Crown's claim under para 5 (b), but it would be right, I think, that I should express briefly the view I would have taken on the rest of the argument on that paragraph had the contention not collapsed in this way. In the first place, 'disposition' may mean 'the instrument, will or settlement by which property is disposed of' or 'the provision in an instrument which deals with particular property': see per Viscount Simonds in *Philipson-Stow v Inland Revenue Comrs*³. In the context afforded by the collocation of words in the definition, the latter appears to me to be the true view. If, therefore, contrary to my decision, the will could be a disposition, one would have to look not to the will in general but to the provisions of the will devising or bequeathing property to trustees, in this case the settlement (using that word in its strict meaning) of The White Bungalow, Hoxne, in cl 8 of the will and the residuary gift in cl 9. It seems to me to follow that the expression 'the trustee or trustees of any settlement' cannot refer to executors as such, but only to trustees, and in my judgment the taxpayer company rightly distinguish the two: see *Re Ponder, Ponder v Ponder*⁴. The £1,827 was not paid to the trustees as such. They could not give a receipt. It was paid to the legal personal representatives. Here, they are the same people, but they might not have been and might not be so in other cases; and in any given case the trustees indeed might, owing to the insufficiency of the estate, never become entitled at all, whether being different persons or the same persons in a different capacity. Once one looks, as it seems to me one must, to the gift on trust and not to the will at large, then it follows in my view that the expression 'trustee or trustees of any settlement' in para 5 (b) cannot include the personal representatives of an estate still in course of administration, be they executors or administrators.

Accordingly, in my judgment, a claim under para 5 (b) fails, and I turn to para 5 (c). Here, the Crown has two alternative strings to its bow. First, it says the executors are interested in the shares as executors; one of them, Charles, is ex hypothesi a participator, and the other two are therefore associates, they being interested in the same shares. This involves looking separately at Charles on the one hand as participator and at his co-executors as associates on the other, which the commissioners

- a shrank from doing. In my judgment, however, that presents no difficulty, although the payment was joint, since here one is not looking at the payment. That difficulty, if it be one, I have already dealt with as a preliminary question on the construction of para 9 (1) of Sch 11. Here one is considering the relationship of a participator to other persons, and I see no difficulty in making that analysis merely because they are all co-executors. Alternatively, the Crown says that each of the executors has a beneficial interest under the will, Charles and John as residuary legatees and all three in the small pecuniary legacy and yearly sum given to each of them by cl 4 and 5 of the will respectively.

- b The taxpayer company submitted that the first claim must fail because 'interest' in para 5 (c) refers only to beneficial interest and does not include a fiduciary one. The taxpayer company further submitted that the alternative fails also because no beneficiary has any legally recognisable interest in any of the assets of a deceased person's estate until administration is completed, but only a chose in action, consisting of the right to have the estate properly administered; and they rely on the decision of the Privy Council in *Comr of Stamp Duties v Livingstone*⁵. If they were right on both limbs, this would be a most extraordinary result indeed.

- c It was not argued that the word 'interest' in para 5 (c) cannot cover both fiduciary and beneficial interests; nor, in my opinion, would that be so: see *Inland Revenue Comrs v Park Investments Ltd*⁶, where Sellers LJ dealing with precisely similar words in s 256 (3) of the Income Tax Act 1952, said 'an interest in the trusts seems to me to involve both the trustees and the beneficiaries'. The fact that there might be trustees and beneficiaries having interests at the same time presents no difficulty. The Crown is entitled to choose either if on the facts one alone will satisfy the conditions of the section: see per Buckley J in the same case⁷.

- d The argument for limiting the word 'interest' to a fiduciary one proceeded on the footing that para 5 as a whole is dealing with family interests, which, so it was said, shows that fiduciary interests are not within the ambit of para 5 (c). I am not at all satisfied that the premise is right, but, even if it be, with all respect I wholly fail to see how any such conclusion follows. On the other hand, the case of *Park Investments Ltd*⁸, to which I have already referred, affords strong support for the view that a fiduciary interest is included: see in particular per Danckwerts LJ⁹. I do not overlook the fact that, although the words were the same, the context was not, but I see no such difference as would affect the conclusion.

- e I derive further support for the inclusion of fiduciary interests from *J Bibby & Sons Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹⁰, where Lord Greene MR said:

- f "The distinction between a legal and a beneficial interest is sufficiently well-known to justify the belief that, if the legislature had intended to draw it, it would have said so in express terms."

- g Further, I can see no difference in this respect between a trustee and an executor who has not yet completed the administration, and in *Park Investments Ltd*¹¹ Winn LJ said "persons interested in any shares", etc., does include trustees, does include executors'. True, he went on to say:

- h "... but is in the subsection for the sole purpose of preventing the addition of one or more persons as holders of shares by putting the shares into the hands of two or three or four trustees instead of one trustee, and also in contemplation of a case where there is more than one executor or administrator of an estate—all aimed against the arithmetical aggregation...'

But that was on the context point whether fiduciary interests are included at all (and I have already dealt with that), not on the question whether executors are included as well as trustees. If there be any difference for present purposes between an executor and a trustee—and I have already said that I can see none—it can only serve to point more strongly to an executor as a person having an interest because, as Viscount Radcliffe explained in the Livingstone case¹², an executor pending completion of the administration has the whole right of property. In my judgment, therefore, this appeal succeeds under para 5 (c) on the ground that the participator Charles and his co-executors both have interests as executors in the deceased's 200 shares.

In the circumstances, it is unnecessary for me to deal with the alternative submission of the Crown, on which the question was much canvassed before me whether the decision in the Livingstone case¹³ applies or is distinguishable on the ground that the word 'interest' has many meanings or a wide meaning and is peculiarly dependent on the context. Lord Radcliffe, referring to beneficiaries in an unadministered estate, used these words¹⁴:

'They can be said, therefore, to have an interest in respect of the assets, or even a beneficial interest in the assets, so long as it is understood in what sense the word "interest" is used in such a context.'

The width of the word and its variety of meanings, and the necessity to consider the context, were further pointed out by Lord Reid and Lord Wilberforce in *Gartside v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹⁵.

Nevertheless, I would just say this, that there appears to me to be a strong context in para 5 (c) to distinguish the Livingstone case¹³ principle, since the words are:

'where the participator is interested in any shares . . . of the company which are subject to any trust or are part of the estate of a deceased person . . .'

It would look as if that must be referring to an interest in an estate not completely administered, since otherwise the shares will have vested absolutely either in the participator or in trustees, and they are separately and specifically covered. However, as I have said, it is unnecessary for me to decide this question, and I leave it open.

Finally, for the sake of completeness I would add that, whatever be the true view on this point, the alternative claim could not have succeeded, in my judgment, because I construe the word 'therein' as referring not to the estate or trust but to the shares. This would prevent the independent executor, Mr Armitage, from having an interest on any construction of that word, for his only interest was in the legacy and annuity.

Appeal allowed.

c On 30th April 1970 the plaintiffs, two Californian companies, Mercer and Stalco, issued a writ against the defendants claiming £600,416 13s 4d damages for alleged breach of contract. On 31st July 1970, unknown to the defendants and the plaintiffs' English advisers, Stalco (the second plaintiffs) merged with another Californian company, Whittaker. From that date according to Californian law Stalco, while ceasing to exist as a separate corporate entity, continued to exist for the purpose of pending suits.

d On 25th February 1971, an agreement having been reached to compromise the action, the defendants consented to judgment against them for £335,000, the action still standing in the name of Mercer and Stalco as plaintiffs. The defendants however, having learnt in March 1971 of the merger, subsequently sought to set aside the consent judgment, contending that since at the material date Stalco had ceased to exist, both the agreement and the judgment were null and void. The plaintiffs applied to amend the title of the action by substituting Whittaker as second plaintiffs. The defendants conceded that had they known of the merger prior to the consent judgment they would have had no objection to Whittaker being substituted for Stalco.

Held – The plaintiffs were entitled to and would be granted an order joining Whittaker as second plaintiffs in substitution for Stalco because—

Interlocutory appeal

This was an appeal by the defendants, Rolls Royce Ltd, against a decision of Donaldson J on 7th April 1971, dismissing a motion by the defendants to set aside a consent judgment dated 25th February 1971 under which the defendants were ordered to pay to the first plaintiffs, Mercer Alloys Corpn, and the second plaintiffs, Stalco International Corpn, the sum of £335,000 and costs. The plaintiffs in their cross-appeal sought to substitute another company, Whittaker Corpn, as second plaintiffs. The facts are set out in the judgment. c

DAVIES LJ. This is the defendants' appeal from an order of Donaldson J made on 7th April 1971 by which he dismissed their motion to set aside a consent judgment dated 25th February 1971 whereby it was adjudged that the defendants pay to the plaintiffs £335,000 and costs. The plaintiffs are, or were at the date of the writ, as the title of the action shows, two Californian companies. I shall refer to them as 'Mercer' and 'Stalco'. The defendants are, of course, the world-renowned engineering company. e

In October 1969 a contract was entered into between the parties whereby the plaintiffs or one or other of them agreed to sell and deliver to the defendants in 1970 a large quantity of nickel. That contract was never performed. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants repudiated it, and the defendants for their part alleged that it was the plaintiffs who repudiated it and that in any event the parties were never ad idem. The writ in the action was issued on 30th April 1970. It was specially endorsed and claimed £392,000 damages for breach of contract. By a subsequent amendment made in January 1971 the claim was increased to £600,416 13s 4d. f

Unknown to the defendants and to the plaintiffs' English solicitors, Messrs Denton, Hall & Burgin, Stalco had on 31st July 1970 been merged into another Californian corporation called Whittaker Corpn, hereinafter called 'Whittaker'. By a certificate of that date issued by the Secretary of State of California, it is certified that as from that date Stalco had ceased to exist as a separate corporate entity. It is this fact that has given rise to the present dispute. g

The hearing of the action had been fixed for 10th March 1971. But on 4th February 1971 a receiver was appointed by the debenture-holders of the defendants. Negotiations then took place with a view to the settlement of the action and eventually it was agreed that the defendants should submit to judgment for £335,000 and costs. Counsel for the defendants explained to us that the receiver was anxious to reduce the possible quantum of damages and the liability for costs which might be incurred if the action were fought out and the plaintiffs were to succeed. So there followed the consent judgment of 25th February 1971. h

On the next day, 26th February, the benefit of the judgment was assigned by Mercer and Whittaker to Marcus Brothers Textile Corpn, a New York corporation, who immediately set about taking proceedings to enforce the judgment in New York, New Jersey, Delaware, California, France and Germany. It would appear j a that, when consenting to the judgment, the receiver had no immediate intention of satisfying it. But the enforcement proceedings by Marcus put the defendants in considerable difficulty. For it appears that, in the American states, at any rate, and possibly in France and Germany too, there is available a process, unknown to our law, by which a plaintiff who commences an action can at the same time and before trial obtain an order in the nature of attachment to seize or freeze the assets of the defendant. And we were told that in each of those five or six jurisdictions assets of the defendants—in each case more than enough to satisfy this judgment debt—have been so attached or frozen.

b Faced with this situation and when they learned of the fact that Stalco had on 31st July 1970 been merged into Whittaker, the defendants on 30th March 1971 applied to the court to set aside the judgment on the ground that before its date Stalco had ceased to exist and that therefore the agreement and the judgment were null and void. The case, with many ramifications, really turned on the effect of s 4116 of the Corporations Code of California, and particularly on the third paragraph thereof. That section provides as follows:

c '(1) Cessation of existence of constituent corporations: Rights of creditors and liens upon property: Pending actions. Upon merger or consolidation pursuant to this article, the separate existence of the constituent corporation ceases, and the consolidated or surviving corporation shall succeed, without other transfer, to all the rights and property of each of the constituent corporations, and shall be subject to all the debts and liabilities of each, in the same manner as if the consolidated or surviving corporation had itself incurred them.

d '(2) All rights of creditors and all liens upon the property of each of the constituent corporations shall be preserved unimpaired, limited in lien to the property affected by such liens immediately prior to the time of the consolidation or merger.

e '(3) Any action or proceeding pending by or against any constituent corporation may be prosecuted to judgment, which shall bind the consolidated or the surviving corporation, or the consolidated or surviving corporation may be proceeded against or substituted in its place.'

f Put as shortly as possible, the contention for the defendants is that the first paragraph of that section effectively puts an end to the existence of the merged corporation (Stalco) for all purposes, and that the third paragraph merely enables what I may call the take-over corporation (Whittaker) to carry on pending actions in the name of Stalco or to substitute its own name for that of Stalco. To put it another way, they submit that the first paragraph is substantive and the third merely procedural. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contend that the first paragraph does not entirely kill Stalco and that by the third paragraph its existence is continued for the purpose of pending suits albeit that the benefit of such choses in action enures entirely to Whittaker.

g The case was fully argued before Donaldson J. The defendants' contention was supported by an affidavit of an American lawyer, Mr Schiff, and that of the plaintiffs by the oral evidence of another American lawyer, Mr Marsh, who in the course and in support of his evidence referred to a large number of American decisions and statutes. At the end of it all, in a full judgment, the learned judge came down on the side of the plaintiffs. 'I consider', he said, 'that Stalco had not ceased to exist in any relevant sense when the consent judgment was given'. It is to be observed that he said that in these circumstances it was not necessary for him to express any view on the submission for the plaintiffs that he ought to affirm the judgment while substituting Whittaker for Stalco.

j The defendants' case was even more elaborately presented in this court. As I ventured to remark in the course of the argument, it was beautifully prepared by the defendants' solicitors and, of course, admirably argued by counsel on their behalf.

But when counsel for the plaintiffs rose to address the court he mentioned that one of the points he wished to argue, pursuant to the plaintiffs' notice, was that in any event the court should give leave to amend the title of the action by substituting or adding Whittaker as a party in order to meet the justice of the case and in order to carry out the clear intention of the parties. When this point was adumbrated by counsel for the plaintiffs, we invited him to deal with it first before entering on the main area of controversy.

There was some discussion whether the court had power to make such an amendment to the proceedings at this stage, that is to say after judgment. The 'slip' rule, RSC Ord 20, r 11, was referred to; but for myself I do not think that that rule is apt to cover the present case. There was also a reference to RSC Ord 15, rr 6 and 7; and I think it may very well be that those rules would enable the court to make the suggested amendment.

Apart from those rules, fundamentally, in my view, the power to make such an amendment rests in the inherent jurisdiction of the court to make such amendments as are necessary to meet the justice of the case. Counsel for the defendants has strenuously argued this morning that the court has no power. He takes really two points on it. He says first of all that the agreement between these parties and the judgment were nullities and a nullity cannot be amended. He also says that the court cannot make any such amendment unless the judgment does not carry out the intention of the parties.

So far as concerns the second point, if anything is clear in this case it is that the then parties wished to settle the dispute on the contract and to put an end to the litigation. So far as concerns the first point, we were referred to two cases, by both counsel for the plaintiffs and for the defendants. The first of them was *Pearlman (Veneers) SA (Pty) Ltd v Bartels*¹. That was a case in which a gentleman who traded in the name of 'Bernhard Bartels' had a judgment against him in this country for something over £47,000. It was sought to enforce the judgment in Germany, and Mr Bartels then took the not very meritorious point that he was not 'Bernhard' Bartels but 'Josef' Bartels. This court, composed of Denning and Hodson LJ, substituted his proper name in the title of the action, the name of the defendant being amended to 'Josef Bartels trading as Bernhard Bartels'. It is important, I think, to read the judgment of Denning LJ in that case. Referring to the defendant's point, he said²:

"That plea sounds very ill in the mouth of the defendant, who instructed solicitors in this country in the name of Bernhard Bartels, made a contract in the name of Bernhard Bartels, entered appearance and fought the whole action in this country in the name of Bernhard Bartels, and now, when it is a matter of enforcing the judgment in Germany, says there is no such person as Bernhard Bartels.

"In order to overcome this very technical point, the plaintiff company apply to the English courts and ask for leave to amend the name of the defendant to "Josef Bartels trading as Bernhard Bartels". The master and the judge, SLADE, J., have made the necessary amendment, and the defendant now appeals to this court contending that these courts have no jurisdiction to amend a judgment once it has been entered. Reliance was placed on the decision of this court in *MacCarthy v. Agard*³. The distinction between that case and the present was drawn by SLADE, J., in a judgment with which I fully agree. In *MacCarthy v. Agard*³ the plaintiff did not seek only to amend the name or the description of the defendant. He sought to alter the very judgment itself, which was in a special form applicable to a married woman. He asked that the operative and substantive part of the a judgment should be omitted. This court, by a majority, held that that could only be done by way of appeal, that is, by leave to appeal being granted and an appeal being lodged accordingly. Nevertheless, in the course of that case itself it appears that this court gave leave to amend the title of the action.

b 'When the substantive judgment is not being altered, but only the title of the action, it is to my mind plain that this court has ample jurisdiction to correct any misnomer or misdescription at any time whether before or after judgment. That is what the master and the learned judge have done in this case. The judgment, which is for £47,353 2s. 6d. with costs against the defendant is unaltered. All that is necessary to be done, which this court has ample power to do, is to alter the title by describing the defendant in the name which he now says is his correct name, Josef Bartels, but adding, so that there shall be no possibility of misunderstanding, "trading as Bernhard Bartels". It is to be hoped, this amendment being made, that there will be no difficulty in enforcing this judgment in Germany according to its true intent. I think this appeal should be dismissed.'

Hodson LJ put the jurisdiction, I think, more on what was then RSC Ord 28, r 11, and is now RSC Ord 20, r 8, but does not now apply after judgment. He said⁴:

d 'I think the wording of that rule is wide enough to cover the amendment of the title and I do not accept the objection which counsel for the defendant has raised, that the rule must necessarily only apply to proceedings before judgment.'

The other case, the well-known case which counsel for the defendants has been discussing in his argument this morning, is *Thynne (Marchioness of Bath) v Thynne (Marquess of Bath)*⁵. That, it will be remembered, was a case that arose out of the marriage of the Marquess and Marchioness of Bath, as they subsequently became. The lady filed a petition for divorce. She alleged that her marriage had taken place in 1927, and she obtained an undefended decree in relation to that marriage. Subsequently her solicitors found out, no doubt to their horror, that the parties had gone through a ceremony of marriage 12 months earlier, in 1926. The question then arose whether that decree was null or whether it could be amended. Lord Merriman P refused to amend it⁶, but this court, by a majority, (Singleton and Morris LJJ,) did give leave to amend the allegation as to the date and place of the marriage and so on. Hodson LJ dissented on the ground that there was no jurisdiction. It is not uninteresting to notice that all three of the learned lords justices in that case cited, without any sign of disapproval, the earlier case of *Pearlman v Bartels*⁷, to which I have just referred. But the point that counsel for the defendants makes on that case is that all three of the Lords Justices treated the decree as being a valid decree dissolving the status of marriage, and it would appear that they took the view that if the decree had been null and void it would not have been possible to make it good in the Court of Appeal.

h Those are the two broad points made by counsel for the defendants in his argument to us this morning: namely, that if this judgment was a nullity (and one must presume for present purposes that it was, though of course the learned judge decided otherwise, and we are not going to decide it at all), then no amendment could cure it; and secondly, counsel for the defendants says, as I have said, that you cannot amend unless you are satisfied that the judgment does not carry out the intention of the parties.

j So far as the second point is concerned, it is perfectly clear to me, as I have already said, that it was the intention of the parties to settle this litigation. Counsel for the defendants I think conceded (and I will return to this again in a moment) that, had it been known to the parties on 25th February 1971 that Whittaker had succeeded Stalco in the sense that I have described, nobody would have had the slightest objection, either as to the agreement or the subsequent judgment, to Whittaker being substituted for Stalco. One can look at it in this way. Supposing that, instead of this not being discovered until some time in March 1971, when it was brought to the notice of the defendants, it was discovered on the day after Donaldson J had ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs. The judgment, according to the argument of counsel for the defendants, would then also be a nullity, having been pronounced in the form that it was. It seems to me preposterous to imagine that if they had gone back to Donaldson J on 26th February or 27th February 1971 it would have been impossible for him to make the amendment.

In my view, both under the rules of court I have mentioned and in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction to see that justice is done and that the intention of the parties is carried out—though this, I agree, is a somewhat extreme case—the court has the power and, if the facts justify it, should exercise the power. I am therefore satisfied that, in the circumstances of this case, the court has jurisdiction to make the amendment.

One then asks whether, in all the circumstances of the case, it would be right and proper to make it. In my judgment, the answer to that is 'Yes'. To repeat something I have already said, in February 1971 the object of the parties in reaching the settlement was to put an end to the litigation. The receiver was content to pay or to submit to judgment for about half of the claim. It made no difference at all to him whether the judgment was in favour of Mercer or Stalco or anyone else, so long as the defendants were protected from the claim for the balance of the £600,000 odd. If Whittaker are joined as parties, the settlement will be binding on them and this object will be achieved. But if the main argument of counsel for the defendants is right and were to prevail and Whittaker are not joined, then I apprehend that Whittaker could start another action the next day for the whole of the £600,000.

It is conceded, as I have already said, by the defendants that had they known in February of this merger they would have had no objection to Whittaker being joined as parties for the purposes of the settlement and the consent judgment. That is obviously right, since the issue of liability in the action and the measure of damages could not in any event be affected by the particular identity of the plaintiff or plaintiffs.

It is further pointed out by the plaintiffs that to refuse the amendment might, in the event of the defendants' argument on the main point of the case proving successful and the action having to go to trial, cause serious delay to the plaintiffs' ability to recover the sum which the defendants in February 1971 agreed to pay. Indeed it would seem that the only benefit which the defendants can possibly derive from their present attitude is to postpone the evil day of payment and to hamper or put a stop to the present enforcement proceedings in foreign courts.

I confess that I have been unable to appreciate any real reason why, in justice to all parties and to give effect to their clear intention, this amendment should not be made. In the light of this conclusion it is, perhaps fortunately, unnecessary and undesirable to express any opinion on the most interesting and difficult questions which arose on the main point of the case.

PHILLIMORE LJ. I agree. In the course of his judgment in *Thynne (Marchioness of Bath) v Thynne (Marquess of Bath)*⁸ Morris LJ said:

'I respectfully agree with what was indicated by EVERSLED, L.J., in *Meier v. Meier*⁹: "I prefer not to attempt a definition of the extent of the court's inherent jurisdiction to vary, modify or extend its own orders if, in its view, the purposes of justice require that it should do so".'

a As I think, this is a case where the purposes of justice clearly require that the court should make the amendment to which Davies LJ has referred, and indeed if it failed to do so the purposes of justice would clearly be stultified.

What has happened here? When this action originally began it was perfectly properly constituted with Mercer Alloys Corpn and Stalco International Corpn as the plaintiffs. In July 1970 there was merger: Stalco International Corpn merged with b Whittaker, who indeed owned them previously—they owned all the shares. Under s 4116 of the Corporations Code of California it would clearly have been quite proper for the action, if it had been in California, to have gone on without any amendment of the parties. Of course, if Whittaker had wanted to they could have had their name substituted for that of Stalco, but it was quite unnecessary. Counsel for the defendants says that that is not the position in this country—that the third paragraph of s 4116 is purely procedural and that in this country it was necessary for this c amendment to be made. I assume that he is right. He concedes, very fairly, that if, on the day when the parties reached agreement on the compromise of the action, anyone had thought to mention the fact of this merger, there could have been no objection by his clients to the substitution of Whittaker for Stalco as one of the two plaintiffs. Nobody stood to gain anything by leaving the action constituted in the d name of Mercer and Stalco as opposed to Mercer and Whittaker. There was never any intention to deceive. What had happened was merely that the American lawyers, no doubt realising that the action would have been properly constituted in California, did not realise that this correction was necessary in England. Consequently the English solicitors for the plaintiffs were not informed of the true situation.

The situation then comes within the words of Singleton LJ in *Thynne v Thynne*¹⁰. e In the course of his judgment he said, dealing with the inherent jurisdiction of the court:

'It is a power, or a right, which ought not to be cut down. It enables the court, in a proper case, to put right something which is incorrectly stated and to keep its records in line with the real position. It is discretionary in the court, and it ought not to be used if it can cause injustice to anyone, or if in any sense the f exercise of it can offend against the public weal.'

I fail to see how this amendment can cause injustice to anyone or offend against the public weal.

Counsel for the defendants has relied on passages in the judgments of the three lords justices in *Thynne v Thynne*¹¹ suggesting that an amendment could not be made under the inherent jurisdiction if the order of the court (in that case a decree) had g been null and void. He says here that as Stalco had ceased to exist following the merger the consent judgment is a nullity. For my part, I think that that is a much too restricted approach. I prefer the approach of Evershed LJ¹² to which I have already alluded.

I think also that this amendment clearly comes within the wording of RSC Ord h 15, r 7, to which Davies LJ has referred. What happened here was that, although of course it does not come within the 'slip' rule, there was in fact an accidental omission by these American litigants; and if ever an accidental omission which has caused no injustice calls for the exercise of the inherent jurisdiction and the use of RSC Ord 15, r 7, it is this one. I think too that support is to be gained from the case of *Pearlman (Veneers) SA (Pty) Ltd v Bartels*¹³, to which Davies LJ has referred. i True, the judgment there could not have been said to be a nullity, and it was treated as a misnomer of misdescription. I do not think that in truth this was anything more.

For those reasons, I entirely agree that this amendment should be made and that this appeal should, accordingly, be dismissed. a

STEPHENSON LJ. I also agree. The learned judge, considering that Stalco had not ceased to exist in any relevant sense when the consent judgment was given and that there were therefore no grounds for setting it aside, expressed no view on the plaintiffs' submission that he should affirm it while substituting Whittaker Corpn in place of Stalco. I share the view expressed by Davies and Phillimore LJ in the judgments just delivered that we should now affirm his judgment, substituting Whittaker for Stalco under the inherent jurisdiction of the court and under RSC Ord 15, rr 6 or 7. b

I am satisfied that if the merger of Stalco with Whittaker on 31st July 1970 had been known to the judge and to the defendants on 25th February 1971, the suit would have been settled as it was settled and the judgment would have been given that was given, except that if the plaintiffs has asked then for the substitution they now seek from this court it would have been agreed to by the defendants and ordered by the judge. I am also satisfied that the substitution we now order carries out the intention of the parties and of the court and, so far from working injustice, is what the purposes of justice require. c

If, as counsel for the defendants contends, the court's jurisdiction to amend one of its own judgments or orders is limited to amendments which carry out the court's intention at the time when it gave the judgment or made the order, there is an obvious objection to the proposed substitution in the admitted fact that the judge, like the defendants, had never heard of Whittaker when he gave the judgment under appeal. d

But in *Thynne (Marchioness of Bath) v Thynne (Marquess of Bath)*¹⁴, Hodson LJ, dissenting, thought that the commissioner, whose decree the parties sought to correct, intended to dissolve their marriage, but the marriage solemnised in 1927 and not the marriage solemnised in 1926, of which he had never heard; whereas Singleton and Morris LJ, who agreed in allowing the amendment, thought that the court intended to dissolve the lawful marriage that was subsisting, whatever the true date of its solemnisation. That generous interpretation of judicial intention encourages me to think that I shall be doing justice to the facts as well as to the parties in this case if I attribute to the judge an intention to order payment of the agreed figure to the persons really entitled to the damages claimed in the action, although one of them was Whittaker, of whom he had never heard. e

Another objection to the proposed substitution is simply that it is a substitution, not the mere correction of a misnomer, as in *Pearlman (Veneers) SA (Pty) Ltd v Bartels*¹⁵, and a new party never can be, or at least never ought to be, added to a suit after judgment, either under the inherent jurisdiction of the court or under RSC Ord 15. I see no reason why the court should not have such jurisdiction to substitute when only by doing so can it do justice. The cases in which such jurisdiction should be exercised must be rare, but the peculiar facts of this case make it, in my judgment, one of them. f

Finally, it is said that we are amending a nullity, something which has never been done, and cannot be done, under our inherent jurisdiction or under the rules. That may be logical, but it is, in my judgment, quite unreal. We are effecting the true intention of all those concerned in this case, as expressed in the consent judgment, to put an end to this litigation—something I should be sorry to think we had no jurisdiction to do. g

- h* This was an appeal by May Clarke against her conviction at Leicester City Quarter Sessions on 10th June 1971 before the Assistant Recorder (E F Jowitt Esq QC) and a jury on a charge of theft. j

Cur adv vult

7th December. ACKNER J read the following judgment of the court. On 9th June 1971 the appellant, a lady of 58 years, was tried at Leicester City Quarter Sessions for what is commonly known as shoplifting. There was nothing out of the ordinary either in relation to the facts of her case or in relation to the nature of her defence. The only unusual feature was the course which the learned assistant recorder unhappily decided to take after the conclusion of the evidence. a

The facts are simple. It was common ground that on 2nd March 1971 the appellant went to the International Stores supermarket at Leicester. She there shopped with the aid of a wire basket provided by the store to enable her, not only to carry the goods of her choice, but also to keep them separate and apart from any other goods and thus enable the cashier readily to calculate the cost of the goods she had purchased from the store. While she was in the store the appellant selected various items, three of which consisted of a pound of butter, a jar of coffee and a jar of mincemeat. At some stage before she went to the check-out point the appellant transferred those goods out of the wire basket and into her own bag so that when she presented her basket those three items were no longer in the wire basket and were not therefore paid for. Understandably enough it was alleged that these goods were secreted into the appellant's own shopping bag with the object of stealing them and taking them out of the store without paying for them. b c

The appellant's defence was that she had no intention of stealing these goods. She had not been feeling well on the morning in question nor for quite some time. She suffers from sugar diabetes. In the previous year she had gone down with 'flu and on the Friday previous to that occurrence her husband had broken his collarbone. He had to look after her and was in fact, because of his own condition, off work for several months. What with one thing and another she had become very depressed. On a number of occasions she had been very forgetful; for example, she had put sugar in the refrigerator instead of in the cupboard and the sweeping brush in the dustbin and then put the dirt where the brush should have been put. In her own words 'everything seemed to get on top of me'. d

On the morning in question she woke up with a very bad head which persisted despite her taking her pills. Her husband rang up at about 11.00 am to say that he would be home for lunch late. She put their meal in the oven on a low flame and went out to fetch the groceries. She had no recollection of putting these three items into her shopping bag and as for the jar of mincemeat neither she nor her husband ever ate this. In short her defence was that she had no intention to steal these articles, but in a moment of absent-mindedness had put them in her own shopping bag. e f

Had the matter rested there, there would have been no complications and the assistant recorder would no doubt have directed the jury to consider her explanation and ask themselves whether they were satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that she had the necessary intent to sustain the charge. However, to support the validity of her explanation medical evidence was called. These witnesses were her general practitioner and a consultant psychiatrist. These two gentlemen both spoke to the fact that she was suffering from depression, which one of them accepted to be a minor mental illness. The general practitioner described the symptoms. The patient feels a lack of energy—he finds it difficult to concentrate—he may be short-tempered or absent-minded. The psychiatrist stated that it can produce states of absent-mindedness in which the patient would do things he would not normally do in periods of 'confusion and memory lapses'. All this evidence was entirely consistent with the appellant's story. g h

Unfortunately the medical witnesses were pressed to, what it seems to us, an unreasonable degree to explain the workings of this particular illness. The psychiatrist stated that what happens in these cases is 'that there is a patchy state of affairs, that the consciousness, if you like, goes off at times and comes on again, changing every few minutes and not in proper control of the patient'. i

The effect of this evidence on the assistant recorder was to convince him that the defence was in truth a defence of 'not guilty by reason of insanity' under the M'Naghten rules¹. He was undoubtedly influenced to this decision by the evidence that the a depression was an illness which he translated as meaning also a disease and by the fact that on the medical evidence, as he understood it, a possible explanation was that there had been a total lack of consciousness at the moment when the offence was committed. In order to sustain a defence under the M'Naghten rules it is necessary to show that the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason from the disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing or if he did know, that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong.

b It may be that on the evidence in this case the assistant recorder was entitled to the view that the appellant suffered from a disease of the mind but we express no concluded view on that. However, in our judgment the evidence fell very far short either of showing that she suffered from a defect of reason or that the consequences of that defect in reason, if any, were that she was unable to know the nature and quality of the act she was doing. The M'Naghten rules relate to accused persons who
c by reason of a disease of the mind are deprived of the power of reasoning. They do not apply and never have applied to those who retain the power of reasoning but who in moments of confusion or absent-mindedness fail to use their powers to the full. The picture painted by the evidence was wholly inconsistent with this being a woman who retained her ordinary powers of reason but who was momentarily d absent-minded or confused and acted as she did by failing to concentrate properly on what she was doing and by failing adequately to use her mental powers.

Because the assistant recorder ruled that the defence put forward had to be put forward as a defence of insanity, although the medical evidence was to the effect that it was absurd to call anyone in the appellant's condition insane, defending counsel felt constrained to advise the appellant to alter her plea from not guilty to guilty so as to avoid the disastrous consequences of her defence, as wrongly defined by the e assistant recorder, succeeding. Thus the appellant in this case ultimately pleaded guilty solely by reason of the assistant recorder's ruling. Since in the view of this court the assistant recorder mis-stated the law this court has jurisdiction to quash the conviction: see *R v Alexander*². The conviction is accordingly quashed.

Administration of estates – Estate duty – Direction for payment in testator's will – Direction to pay 'funeral and testamentary expenses . . . and all death duties' out of residue – Estate consisting of personalty only – Duty payable on pecuniary gifts inter vivos prior to death – Duty payable on nomination in respect of post office savings bank account – Nomination taking effect on testator's death – Reference to estate duty otiose unless referring to gifts outside ambit of will – Application outside the ambit of will limited to gift taking effect on testator's death – Duty on inter vivos gifts to be borne by donees – Duty on nomination payable out of estate.

By her will made in 1963, the testatrix gave, devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate to her trustee, the fourth defendant, on trust to sell the same and out of the proceeds 'pay my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and all death duties' and hold the net residue thereof on trust as to one-fifth share to each of the first three defendants, and, in the event which happened, the fourth defendant, and the fifth share to the fifth defendant for life and over. In 1964 she made a nomination of the moneys in her post office savings bank account in favour of the fourth defendant. During 1967 she made gifts of £3,208 each to the first five defendants. By a second codicil in June 1968 she appointed the plaintiffs' predecessors in title joint executors and trustees with the fourth defendant. She died in October 1968. Probate of her will and codicils was granted to the executors in January 1969. The post office savings bank nomination took effect on her death, the amount being £5,026. The net value of her estate, all of which was personalty, was £94,500. On the question whether, by reason of the reference in the will to payment of estate duty, the duty payable on the testatrix's death in respect of the five pecuniary gifts, and the nomination of the moneys in the post office savings bank account in favour of the fourth defendant, should be borne by the testatrix's estate or by the first five defendants and the fourth defendant respectively,

Held – Since the gifts in the will were all of personalty the reference to estate duty was otiose unless it applied to gifts made outside the ambit of the will; if it were not to be treated as otiose it should be given as limited an application to dispositions outside the will as avoided the reference being otiose; the post office savings bank nomination took effect on the testatrix's death whereas the inter vivos gifts took effect before her death; it was therefore possible to give the direction to 'pay . . . all death duties' a meaning which was not otiose but was limited to dispositions becoming effective on her death; accordingly the estate duty payable in respect of the inter vivos gifts was to be borne by the first five defendants whereas the duty payable in respect of the money in the post office savings bank account should be paid out of the estate in the due course of administration (see p 224 e to h, post).

b Adjourned summons

- This was an application by originating summons dated 28th August 1970 by the plaintiffs, National Westminster Bank Ltd, one of the executors and trustees of the will dated 20th October 1963 and codicils dated respectively 1st October 1964 and 14th June 1968 of Sarah Elizabeth Gertrude Walley, who died on 15th October 1968. The defendants were (1) Mary Williams, (2) Margaret Walley, (3) John Ernest Walley, (4) Joseph Hanson Macfarlane, (5) Joseph Hanson Walley, (6) Anne Corcoran, (7) Alfred David Walley, (8) Susan Walley and (9) Lynn Walley, the first five defendants being the nieces and nephews of the testatrix and the sixth to ninth defendants the children of the fifth defendant. By this summons the plaintiffs sought the determination by the court of the following questions: (1) that it might be determined whether on the true construction of the will of the testatrix, and in the events which had happened, the estate duty payable on the death of the testatrix in respect of five inter vivos gifts of money made by the testatrix in 1967 to each of the first five defendants (a) ought to be borne in respect of each such gift by the respective recipients thereof or (b) ought to be paid out of the estate of the testatrix in the due course of administration; (2) that it might be determined whether on the true construction of the will and in the events which had happened the estate duty payable on the death of the testatrix in respect of money in the post office savings bank account to which the fourth defendant became entitled on her death as a result of a nomination made by her (a) ought to be borne by the fourth defendant or (b) ought to be paid out of the estate of the testatrix in the due course of administration. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- UNGOED-THOMAS J. This summons raises the question whether, under the terms of the will of the testatrix, Sarah Elizabeth Gertrude Walley, the estate duties payable on certain dispositions made during her lifetime are payable out of the residue of her estate. By her will she directed payment of testamentary expenses and of death duties, and then disposed of the residue. In her lifetime she made gifts of £3,208 to each of five of the defendants, and also nominated one of them as donee of the moneys to her credit in her post office account. The nomination took effect on her death and resulted in the nominee obtaining £5,026 odd. The question is whether, by reason of the reference in the will to payment of estate duty, the estate duty payable on the testatrix's death in respect of the five pecuniary gifts and the money in the post office account which was the subject of the nomination should be borne by the testatrix's estate or by the inter vivos donees and the nominee.
- The will was made on 20th October 1963. By para 4 the testatrix gave, devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate to her trustee on trust that he should sell, and out of the moneys thereby produced pay 'my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and all death duties and shall hold the net residue thereof (hereinafter called "my Residuary Estate") upon trust': as to one-fifth share to each of the first three defendants, and, in the event that happened, the fourth defendant, and in the case of the fifth share, the fifth defendant for life and over. The will was followed by the post office savings bank nomination in August 1964. Then followed a codicil which expressly confirmed the will, and later, in 1967, the pecuniary gifts of £3,208 which I have mentioned. They were followed, in 1968, by a second codicil, which did not, in express terms, confirm the will.

d
The testatrix died on 15th October 1968, and probate was granted, in January 1969, to the plaintiffs' predecessors in title, the Westminster Bank Ltd and the fourth defendant, who were those nominated in the will and codicil as executors and trustees. The estate was, at the testatrix's death, valued at the sum of £94,500 net. It is common ground that estate duty on the gifts and the money from the nomination, would be borne by those to whom they were made unless the will provides otherwise. So the issue turns on the words which I have quoted, the direction to the executors and trustees to 'pay my funeral and testamentary expenses . . . and all death duties'. 'Testamentary expenses', subject to irrelevant exceptions, includes estate duty on personal property which a testator is incompetent to dispose of at the time of his death. So the direction in this will to pay estate duty out of residue is otiose unless it applies to property other than personal property which he is competent to dispose of at his death. But it seems to me that where a testator is simply providing for payment of estate duty out of residue (whether on true construction the provision is limited to personalty or extends to realty), he is doing so as part of the will which he is making and presumably and prima facie with reference to what falls within the ambit of his will, and thus providing prima facie for estate duty ancillary to the disposition which he makes in his will. Therefore, where there is a direction for payment of testamentary expenses and estate duty, the estate duty prima facie, in my view, refers to duty on gifts by will other than gifts of personal property.

f
The difficulty in this case is, to my mind, that the gifts in this will are all of personalty. The result is that the reference to estate duty is otiose unless it applies to gifts made outside the ambit of the will. But so to apply it is to my mind a substantial departure from the prima facie limitation to estate duty payable on dispositions made by the will. If the reference to payment of estate duty is not to be treated as otiose, it seems to me that it should be given as limited an application to dispositions outside the will as avoids the reference being otiose. In this case, the nomination to the post office account takes full effect and becomes operative at the testatrix's death by passing to the nominee the money standing to the credit of that account then, whereas the gifts inter vivos are gifts which have taken full effect and become operative before the death of the testatrix. It is therefore possible in this case to give the direction to 'pay . . . all death duties' a meaning limited to death duties payable on property whose gift becomes effective and operative on the testatrix's death and does not fall within the direction to 'pay . . . testamentary expenses'.

I have hesitated whether the testatrix or a draftsman, drawing a will containing such well-established common form phrases for payment of testamentary expenses and all death duties contemplated that death duties should be payable in respect of dispositions made in the testatrix's lifetime. But I have on the whole come to the conclusion on construction, in accordance with the approach established in these courts, that the direction to pay death duties should extend to payment of death duties in respect of the post office money.

Order accordingly.

MEGARRY J

- b* Income tax – Avoidance – Transfer of assets abroad – Information – Power of commissioners by notice to require information – Power to require such particulars as commissioners think necessary for specified purposes – Ordinary banking transactions between bank and customer – Sales of gilt-edged stocks by bank on behalf of company incorporated abroad – Notice by commissioners to bank requiring particulars of transactions and of persons representing or interested in company – Whether particulars that may be required confined to particulars of transactions in which addressee of notice engaged – Whether sales of stock ‘ordinary banking transactions’ – Income Tax Act 1952, s 414 (1), (3), (5).

By a notice dated 11th September 1969 (‘the 1969 notice’) given under s 414 (1)^a of the Income Tax Act 1952 the Commissioners of Inland Revenue required the plaintiff bank to give them particulars concerning certain transactions and persons. The transactions in question consisted of the sales of gilt-edged stocks carried out by the bank on behalf of a company incorporated in the Bahamas (‘the company’). Unknown to the bank, the transactions in question were of a type known as ‘bond-washing’, a device which was designed to make a relatively slender profit at the expense of the Revenue by means of purchasing gilt-edged stock ex dividend and promptly selling it cum dividend during the period within which transactions in such stocks might be either ex or cum dividend. The arrangement between the bank and the company under which the transactions were carried out was that the bank was to take delivery in their nominee’s name of gilt-edged stock purchased on behalf of the company, pay for it and then promptly sell it ‘at best’, i.e. cum dividend, thereby recouping themselves out of the proceeds. According to evidence given on behalf of the bank these transactions (disregarding their bond-washing aspect) were ‘common form transactions which the vast majority of bankers would carry out in the ordinary course of a day’s work without question’, but it was conceded that they were somewhat unusual in that the sales had to be effected through a specified jobber and the customer was resident outside the United Kingdom. It was also conceded that the nature of the transactions, whereby the bank received the stock, paid for it and sold it, all at a blow, were rather unusual and not an everyday occurrence. Under the 1969 notice the commissioners required the bank to furnish particulars under four heads: (1) particulars of the manner in which the instructions for each sale were received and the names and addresses of the persons giving the instructions and other persons acting on behalf of the company; (2) particulars of the agreement under which the transactions were carried out together with the names and addresses of ‘individuals concerned in such agreement’; (3) names and addresses of persons known or believed by the bank ‘or any officer, employee or agent’ of the bank to have control of, or a beneficial interest in, the company; (4) the name and address of the representative of the company who, at a certain interview, had discussions with a representative of the bank. It was contended by the bank that they were not bound to furnish any of the particulars required by the 1969 notice on the grounds (i) that the transactions in question were ‘ordinary banking transactions between the bank and a customer carried out in the ordinary course of banking business’ within s 414 (5)^b of the 1952 Act, and the bank were thus relieved from the obligation to supply the information required under heads (1) and (2) in the 1969 notice; (ii) that heads (3) and (4) were also bad in that, by virtue of s 414 (1) and (3)^c, the only a Section 414 (1) is set out at p 230 f, post

c Section 414 (3) is set out at p 230 h and j, post particulars that could be required were particulars of transactions in which the addressee of the notice had been engaged; and (iii) that if any of the questions in the 1969 notice were questions that the bank could not be lawfully required to answer, the whole notice was bad.

Held – (i) The bank was bound to furnish all the particulars required by the 1969 notice for the following reasons—

(a) on its true construction s 414 (1) was wide enough in its terms to authorise all four heads of the 1969 notice; the particulars which the commissioners might require were expressly limited to those they thought ‘necessary for the purposes of’ the tax avoidance provisions of the 1952 Act and there were no grounds for reading into s 414 (1) a more restrictive limitation to particulars of such ‘transfers of assets’ or ‘associated operations’ as the addressee of the notice had been engaged in; furthermore s 414 (3) was not an exhaustive definition of the particulars that might be required since both the language and history of the subsection pointed against the word ‘include’ meaning ‘include and mean’; accordingly, since it had been accepted that the commissioners could and did think that the particulars specified in the 1969 notice were ‘necessary’ for the specified purposes, it followed that all the information sought by the notice was within the authority of s 414 (1) (see p 232 c to e and g and p 233 b, post);

(b) not every ‘common-form’ transaction by a bank was an ‘ordinary’ banking transaction nor did it follow that every transaction carried out by a bank was a ‘banking transaction’; having regard to the evidence as a whole the bank had failed to establish that, even if the transactions were ‘banking transactions’, they were ‘ordinary’ banking transactions within the meaning of s 414 (5) (see p 237 c and j to p 238 b, post).

(ii) Even if some of the questions in the 1969 notice had been questions which the bank could not have been lawfully required to answer, it did not follow that the notice as a whole was bad; although there was authority for the proposition that the inclusion of an unauthorised demand in a return that was one and indivisible, and where a penalty was imposed for failure to make ‘such return’, invalidated the requirement for making the return, in the present case there was no demand for the making of an indivisible return; the 1969 notice required the furnishing of particulars and even if the requirement in respect of certain particulars was unauthorised it did not follow that the requirement in respect of other particulars relating to separate matters was necessarily invalid (see p 239 e to h, post).

Adjourned summons

- b By an originating summons dated 16th October 1969 the plaintiff, the Royal Bank of Canada, sought the determination by the court on the question whether, on the true construction of the Income Tax Act 1952, s 414, they were bound to furnish all or any of the particulars required by the defendants, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, by a notice dated 11th September 1969. The facts are set out in the judgment,

Cur adv vult

- 15th November. MEGARRY J read the following judgment. Under this originating summons, various questions arise on the construction and operation of the Income Tax Act 1952, s 414. These questions do not appear to be the subject of previous authority, although they are plainly of importance to banks and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and, through them, to others. It is common ground that the plaintiff, the Royal Bank of Canada, carries on the business of a bank; and I shall refer to it as 'the bank'. The defendants are the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and I shall refer to them as 'the commissioners'. The basic question is how far, if at all, the bank is bound to comply with a notice dated 11th September 1969, which I shall call 'the 1969 notice'. This was served on the bank by the commissioners, and it required the bank to give the commissioners certain information about certain transactions and persons. The bank is perfectly willing to give the information sought by the 1969 notice insofar as that notice is valid and effective, but not otherwise. The bank has, of course, especial regard to its obligations of secrecy in respect of its customers, and in these proceedings the argument that the bank is not bound to comply with any of the requirements of the notice has accordingly been put forward by the bank.

f

The 1969 notice reads as follows:

g

'With reference to the sales of gilt-edged stocks listed in the Schedule to this Notice, being sales carried out by the Royal Bank of Canada (hereinafter referred to as "the Bank") on behalf of Poinsettia Investments Ltd., a company incorporated in the Bahama Islands, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue hereby require the Bank to furnish to them, on or before the 16th day of October, 1969, at the address shown above:—

'1. Full particulars of the manner in which the instructions for each sale were received by or on behalf of the Bank (that is, whether orally or in writing or by cable or by a combination of two or more of those methods), and the names and addresses of all persons who (a) gave such instructions, or (b) in any way represented or held themselves out to the Bank or any officer, employee or agent of the Bank as representing Poinsettia Investments Ltd. in connection with the said sales or any of them or the disposal of any of the proceeds of the sales, or (c) acted as guarantors or sureties of Poinsettia Investments Ltd. in connection with the said sales or any of them.

'2. Full particulars of any agreement, arrangement or understanding pursuant to which in whole or in part the sales or any of them were effected and to which the Bank or any officer, employee or agent of the Bank was a party, including the names and addresses of the individuals concerned in such agreement, arrangement or understanding on behalf of each party.

'3. The names and addresses of the persons who are known or believed by the Bank or any officer, employee or agent of the Bank to have had at the time of or since the sales or any of them control of or a beneficial interest in Poinsettia Investments Ltd.; and, if any such person is a company, similar information in respect of that company. a

'4. The name and address of the representative of Poinsettia Investments Ltd. with whom, at the interview thought to have taken place on the 28th January 1966, a representative of the Bank discussed a matter referred to in a letter dated the 25th January 1966 from the Governor of the Bank of England to the Chairman of the Bank bearing on the sales or any of them.' b

It will be observed that, put broadly, questions 1 and 2 require particulars of certain transactions, with the names and addresses of those concerned, while questions 3 and 4 merely require certain names and addresses. The schedule to the notice specifies 14 sales of gilt-edged stock at prices between 91 and 105, or thereabouts, carried out at dates between 1st June 1964, and 22nd June 1965, in nominal amounts ranging from £150,000 to £525,000. The heading of the schedule is: c

'Sales of gilt-edged stock carried out on behalf of Poinsettia Investments Ltd. since the 5th April 1961 on a cum dividend basis during the 21 day period preceding the ex dividend date of the stock.'

The summons asks two questions, the second having been added by consent during the hearing. The first is whether under s 414 the bank is bound to furnish 'all or any and, if only some, which of the particulars' required by the 1969 notice. The second question asks that if the answer to question 1 is that the bank is not bound to furnish any of the particulars, it may be determined whether any and if so which of the particulars were particulars which the commissioners were empowered to require the bank to furnish under s 414. d

Although the six days of argument before me opened up many prospects, the core of the bank's attack on the 1969 notice remained within the three heads that counsel for the bank helpfully postulated at the outset. First, he contended that the bank was relieved from the obligation of answering the first two questions by the terms of s 414 (5). Second, he said that the last two questions in the 1969 notice were bad in limine as they did not relate to 'transactions', and all that s 414 required was the giving of particulars of transactions in which the addressee of the 1969 notice had been engaged. Third, he argued that if any of the questions asked by the 1969 notice were questions which the bank could not lawfully be required to answer, the whole notice was bad. If the last two questions were bad, they accordingly invalidated the first two as well. Counsel for the bank did not contend that the commissioners lacked sufficient grounds on which they could in the circumstances of this case address a valid notice under s 414 to the bank; indeed, he accepted that there were adequate grounds on which some such notice could be given to the bank. But, he said, the notice that was in fact sent was bad. e

In those circumstances, I do not need to explore the complexities of s 412. Sections 412 to 414 inclusive constitute Chapter IV of Part XVIII of the Income Tax Act 1952; and the title of the chapter is 'Transactions Resulting in Transfer of Income to Persons Abroad'. The marginal note to s 412 is 'Provisions for preventing avoidance of income tax by transactions resulting in the transfer of income to persons abroad'; and s 413 contains supplementary provisions. The power of the commissioners to serve notices under s 414 is a power to require such particulars as the commissioners 'think necessary for the purposes of this Chapter'; but as there is, quite properly, no suggestion that the commissioners did not think the notice necessary for those purposes I need say no more about s 412. f

Before I turn to the terms of s 414, I must say something more about the transactions in question. It is common ground that they were all of the type known by the name of 'bond-washing', a somewhat convoluted cousin of dividend-stripping. Bond-washing is a device which makes a relatively slender profit at the expense of g a the Revenue by means of purchasing gilt-edged stock ex dividend and promptly selling it cum dividend within one of the 21 day periods during which transactions in these stocks may be either ex dividend or cum dividend. The modus operandi, which is of a considerable degree of complexity and sophistication, was patiently described to me by counsel for the commissioners, but I do not think it necessary to burden this judgment with it. It suffices to say that at all relevant dates bond-washing was a type of transaction which, although not illegal, was frowned on by b reputable persons and institutions (including the bank) as involving a misuse of arrangements which, properly employed, were of utility to those who dealt in the gilt-edged market. It is clear that at the relevant time the bank did not know that the transactions with which it was concerned formed part of bond-washing transactions.

c The only evidence before me consists of three affidavits filed on behalf of the bank, with their exhibits, coupled with the cross-examination of two of the three deponents. During the period of the transactions, Mr C F Stuart, the deponent who was not cross-examined, was assistant manager of the City office of the bank. The other two deponents were Mr J J Matheson, who was manager of the securities department of that branch of the bank, and Mr J F Smith who, during the time in question, was d manager of the branch. The hierarchy, so far as relevant, was that Mr Matheson was under Mr Stuart, who was under Mr Smith. It was Mr Stuart who was mainly concerned with the 14 sales in question; and his affidavit resorts to the convenient device of referring by fictitious names to those concerned whose identities may or may not have to be revealed, depending on the efficacy of the 1969 notice. I shall preface such fictitious names with the word 'Fictitious'.

e One important name, however, has for long been known to the commissioners, namely, Poinsettia Investments Ltd, which I shall refer to as 'Poinsettia'; indeed Poinsettia is referred to in the 1969 notice. As that notice states, Poinsettia was a company incorporated in the Bahama Islands, and the transactions in question were carried out on behalf of that company. When in October 1967 the commissioners began to make enquiries about certain 1965 transactions which ultimately were f included in the 1969 notice, the officers of the bank who were concerned with those enquiries did not know that on 22nd December 1966 Poinsettia had been struck off the register of companies in the Bahamas. The bank had previously been instructed by a representative of Poinsettia not to make disclosures, and so the bank at first refused to divulge that Poinsettia was concerned. However, after the officers concerned had discovered that Poinsettia was no more, the bank wrote to the commissioners in October 1968, disclosing both Poinsettia's name and the 14 transactions g which later became the subject of the 1969 notice. The bank had in fact received notice in 1966 of the resolution to wind up Poinsettia, but apparently this had been placed in another file. I should make it clear that throughout the hearing before me no attack whatever has been made on the integrity or good faith of the bank or its officers.

h The activities of the bank in relation to the 14 transactions were limited. The first contact between Poinsettia and the bank was in May 1964, when Mr Fictitious Coke telephoned Mr Stuart to say that Poinsettia was going to be advised on investments by Mr Fictitious Stock. At about the same time, the bank received a letter from Fictitious Doe Co, setting out the nature of the operations proposed. The letter, dated 22nd May 1964, and marked for the attention of Mr Stuart, reads as follows:

i 'Our clients, Poinsettia Investments Limited of P.O. Box 288, Nassau, Bahamas are desirous of making purchases on the Gilt Edged market from time to time, and would like you to act on their behalf in this connection.

'The stock will be purchased by Montreal Trust Company of your City, registered in your Nominee name and delivered to you against payment and for subsequent sale upon our instructions.

'In order to facilitate these operations, our clients propose to cable their instructions to you indicating the particular stock to be accepted from Montreal Trust Company against payment and to be sold in accordance with the code words enclosed with this letter and by figures representing units of £1,000 stock.

'Perhaps you would be good enough to confirm that these arrangements are satisfactory from your point of view.'

Poinsettia also applied to the bank for £500,000 credit for short term loans, and the bank referred this by cable to its head office in Montreal, recommending acceptance on the basis of the security offered and the standing of the principals. A substantial company guaranteed a margin of £25,000, and in carrying out the transactions the bank would, of course, have in the name of its nominee the gilt-edged securities purchased with the money lent. The proposed transactions were described as 'staggering new issues' and 'taking short term positions in gilt-edged market in London'. The head office of the bank agreed, and operations began soon afterwards. All that the bank had to do was to take delivery of stock already purchased and standing in the name of its nominee, pay for it, and then promptly sell it 'at best', that is, cum dividend, thus recouping itself the money advanced. This process in fact produced a modest profit for Poinsettia on each occasion. I shall not go further into the details of the transactions as I hope that I have said enough to make intelligible the questions I have to resolve.

I must now turn to s 414. The Income Tax Act 1952 is, of course, a consolidating Act, and so is presumed not to have changed the effect of the provisions that it consolidates. I shall therefore make some reference to the sources of the various subsections. I take the section in the amended form in which it stood when the 1969 notice was served. By sub-s (1):

'The Commissioners of Inland Revenue or, for the purpose of charging tax at the standard rate, an inspector may by notice in writing require any person to furnish them within such time as they may direct (not being less than twenty-eight days) with such particulars as they think necessary for the purposes of this Chapter.'

This subsection has been in the forefront of the argument. It is all that remains of what was originally para 6 of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1936, a schedule which was appended to s 18 of that Act, the precursor of s 412 of the Income Tax Act 1952. Para 6 had within it a defence of reasonable excuse, and provisions for a penalty not exceeding £50; and these later became, in a generalised form, the Finance Act 1960, ss 63 (2) and 46 (1) respectively. The original s 414 (2) of the Income Tax Act 1952, drawn from the Finance Act 1936, Sch 2, para 7, authorised estimated assessments, and was later replaced by the general provisions of the Income Tax Management Act 1964, s 5 (1), (2): I do not think I need mention it further.

Section 414 (3) of the Income Tax Act 1952, on the other hand, is an important provision. It runs as follows:

'The particulars which a person must furnish under this section, if he is required by a notice from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or, for the purpose of charging tax at the standard rate, an inspector so to do, include particulars—
(a) as to transactions with respect to which he is or was acting on behalf of others; and (b) as to transactions which in the opinion of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or, for the purpose of charging tax at the standard rate, an inspector it is proper that they should investigate for the purposes of this Chapter notwithstanding that, in the opinion of the person to whom the notice is given, no liability to tax arises under this Chapter; and (c) as to whether the person to whom the notice is given has taken or is taking any, and if so what, part in any, and if so what, transactions of a description specified in the notice.'

- a* This subsection had no counterpart in the Finance Act 1936, but was brought in by the Finance Act 1939, s 17 (1).

There is then s 414 (4) of the Income Tax Act 1952. This has not been directly in issue, though it has been relied upon as throwing light on other provisions. It is as follows:

- b* 'Notwithstanding anything in subsection (3) of this section, a solicitor shall not be deemed for the purposes of paragraph (c) thereof to have taken part in a transaction by reason only that he has given professional advice to a client in connection with that transaction, and shall not, in relation to anything done by him on behalf of a client, be compellable under this section, except with the consent of his client, to do more than state that he is or was acting on behalf of a client, and give the name and address of his client and also—(a) in the case of anything done by the solicitor in connection with the transfer of any asset by or to an individual ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom to or by any such body corporate as is hereinafter mentioned, or in connection with any associated operation in relation to any such transfer, the names and addresses of the transferor and the transferee or of the persons concerned in the associated operations, as the case may be; (b) in the case of anything done by the solicitor in connection with the formation or management of any such body corporate as is hereinafter mentioned, the name and address of the body corporate; (c) in the case of anything done by the solicitor in connection with the creation, or with the execution of the trusts, of any settlement by virtue or in consequence whereof income becomes payable to a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom, the names and addresses of the settlor and of that person. [The subsection concludes with the words:] The bodies corporate mentioned in the preceding provisions of this section are bodies corporate resident or incorporated outside the United Kingdom which are, or, if resident in the United Kingdom would be, close companies, but not trading companies, within the meaning of Part IV of the Finance Act, 1965.'

- f* This subsection had its origin in the Finance Act 1939, s 17 (2).

Finally, there is s 414 (5) of the Income Tax Act 1952; and on this the bank has placed much reliance. It provides as follows:

- g* 'Nothing in this section shall impose on any bank the obligation to furnish any particulars of any ordinary banking transactions between the bank and a customer carried out in the ordinary course of banking business, unless the bank has acted or is acting on behalf of the customer in connection with the formation or management of any such body corporate as is mentioned in paragraph (b) of subsection (4) of this section or in connection with the creation, or with the execution of the trusts, of any such settlement as is mentioned in paragraph (c) thereof.'

- h* This too had its origin in the Finance Act 1939, as s 17 (3) of that Act.

- i* I begin with the phrase 'such particulars as they think necessary for the purposes of' the tax avoidance provisions of s 18 of the Finance Act 1936, or Chapter IV of Part XVIII of the Income Tax Act 1952. This seems to me an expression that is wide in its meaning, both in itself and in its context. Counsel for the bank contended on a number of grounds that its scope was somewhat restricted. He urged that the word 'particulars' posed the question, 'Particulars of what?', and that this question must then receive the answer of the matters dealt with in the relevant tax avoidance provisions. These provisions are drafted in terms of 'transfers of assets' and 'associated operations', and so the particulars that could be required were particulars of those transfers and operations but of nothing else, even though it formed part of some prelude or sequel. The particulars were limited to particulars of such transactions as the addressee of the notice had been engaged in, and did not extend to other transactions, nor to any other information, such as the ownership of shares apart from any transaction: the power was a power to require particulars of dynamics, and did not extend to particulars of statics. Counsel for the bank also relied on s 414 (3). This provides that the particulars which must be furnished under sub-s (1) 'include particulars' as to the two types of 'transactions' set out in paras (a) and (b), and as to whether the person to whom the notice was addressed took or was taking part in 'transactions' of a description specified in the notice: see para (c). Counsel for the bank accepted, of course, that the word used is 'include' and not 'means', and that 'include' is very generally used to enlarge the meaning of a phrase or avoid doubts, or both; but he contended that the word 'include' was used here in the sense of 'mean and include', and he relied for support on the well-known passage in Lord Watson's judgment in *Dilworth v Stamps Comr*¹.

I do not think that these contentions are sound. First, the statutory phrase is 'such particulars as they think necessary' for the purposes specified. Parliament did not think it requisite to confine the word 'particulars' in terms by stating of what the particulars must be. The word 'particulars' is quite capable of standing on its own in the sense of items or details or points, and the scope of the particulars is in terms limited by the words 'as they think necessary' for the specified purpose. This express delimitation seems to me at least in some degree inconsistent with the existence of some further implied limitation. If the commissioners think it necessary to obtain certain particulars for the specified purposes, then I think Parliament intended them to be able to obtain that information without being met with the answer 'The only particulars you can have are particulars of transfers of assets, associated operations and other transactions, and not particulars of anything else, even though you think them necessary for the specified purposes'. I find it difficult to see why Parliament, in conferring powers to obtain information to prevent certain forms of avoidance of income tax, and in terms limiting those powers only by reference to what the commissioners think necessary for the purpose, should nevertheless intend, by some covert and implied limitation, to prevent the commissioners from obtaining part of the information that they think necessary. Furthermore (although this was not relied on in argument), it may be observed that where Parliament wishes to confine its use of the word 'particulars' to particulars of some specified matter, Parliament seems quite capable of stating this in terms: see s 414 (5), where the phrase is 'particulars of any ordinary banking transactions', and so on.

As for sub-s (3), both its language and its history seem to me to point against the word 'include' meaning 'include and mean'. Initially, in the Act of 1936, there was no ancestor of sub-s (3): para 6 of Sch 2 used the word 'particulars' without any explanation. The precursor of sub-s (3) was s 17 (1) of the Finance Act 1939, and this was drafted in the form of 'It is hereby declared that the particulars which a person must furnish . . . include particulars— . . .'. In the process of consolidation, the words 'It is hereby declared' have disappeared, though this change will be presumed not to have affected the construction. Furthermore, the first category of particulars which under sub-s (3) a person must furnish is particulars '(a) as to transactions with respect to which he is or was acting on behalf of others'. If sub-s (3) were truly defining, and not extending or merely removing doubt, it is remarkable that the primary category does not consist of transactions in which the person concerned is acting on his own behalf and not on behalf of others. Indeed, it is not clear to me under which head at least some cases of a person acting on his own behalf could be brought. Counsel for the bank relied on sub-s (3) (c), but this seems to me to be an oblique and imperfect instrument for his purpose. Furthermore, sub-s (3) (b), requiring particulars to be given 'notwithstanding that, in the opinion of the person to whom the notice is given, no liability to tax arises under this Chapter', a seems to me to be essentially the type of provision which is inserted for the removal of doubt and the stopping up of possible loopholes, rather than for the purpose of primary definition.

b From what I have said it follows that in my judgment s 414 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952 is on its true construction wide enough in its terms to authorise all four heads of the 1969 notice. Once it is accepted (as it has been) that the commissioners could and did think the particulars specified in the notice 'necessary' for the specified purposes, then all the information sought by the 1969 notice seems to me to be within the authority given by the subsection. In particular, I can see nothing in the language of the subsection, construed in its context, to draw any distinction between the particulars of the transactions sought under questions 1 and 2 of the notice and the names and addresses sought under questions 3 and 4, as well as under questions 1 and 2. Furthermore, I observe that sub-s (4) provides that a solicitor is not, in relation to anything done by him on behalf of a client, to be 'compellable under this section' (except with the client's consent) to do 'more than state that he is or was acting on behalf of a client, and give the name and address of his client'; and para (a), (b) and (c) make further provision for names and addresses. This, it will be seen, is cast in the form not of imposing a positive obligation to give the names and addresses but of an exemption from the obligations of the section to give the particulars which the commissioners think necessary, which exemption is not to extend to the names and addresses mentioned. In other words, the assumption of sub-s (4) is that names and addresses are or may be included in the particulars which under the main provisions of the section the commissioners may require to be given, and sub-s (4) is doing no more than preventing the exemption which it confers from interfering with that obligation to give names and addresses.

e Accordingly, in my judgment questions 3 and 4 are authorised by s 414. At the same time I cannot refrain from observing on the width of question 3. This requires the names and addresses of persons known or believed 'by the Bank or any officer, employee or agent of the Bank' to have had at the time of the sales or subsequently 'control of or a beneficial interest in' Poinsettia. The question is framed in terms which relate to the bank generally, and not merely the branch in question, and I do not know what is the total number of the officers, employees and agents of the bank. But it is plain that a wholehearted attempt to comply with the requirements of this question might well involve the bank in a very considerable burden of enquiry among its staff. I need not pursue this point since counsel for the bank founded no argument on it; it was counsel for the commissioners who had the burden of meeting somewhat pointed comment on the matter from the bench. I shall say no more than that it seems to me that the wider the powers that Parliament confides to the commissioners, the more important it is that the commissioners should not exercise those powers in an unduly burdensome or oppressive way. A question asked in September 1969, which requires the bank to ascertain whether any of its officers, employees or agents, wherever they may be in the world, knows or believes that any person had on 1st June 1964 or subsequently any beneficial interest in Poinsettia is of an amplitude which, if repeated, may hereafter attract to itself robust judicial criticism.

j Counsel for the commissioners contended that the words 'officer, employee or agent' in the 1969 notice meant merely any officer, employee or agent who properly appeared to the bank to be potentially able to give the information sought; but no such limiting words appear in the 1969 notice, and counsel for the commissioners had no real explanation why they were not, if that was what the question really meant. The recipient of such a notice ought not to be driven to his lawyer to find out (if, indeed, his lawyer can tell him) precisely what words of restriction are to be implied, when the commissioners could so easily have inserted those words if they had in truth been intended. I shall only add that for my part I should be slow to read s 414 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952, or any similar section supported by penal sanctions, as if the phrase 'such particulars as they think necessary for the purpose of this Chapter' were followed by words such as 'however burdensome or oppressive this may be'. Nor do I think that it suffices to point to the provisions as to 'reasonable excuse' in the Finance Act 1960, s 63 (2), as a cure for any excessive demands made by a notice such as that before me. At the same time, let me say that I am not suggesting that in this case there was any deliberate unreasonableness or oppression; I am sounding a warning for the future. a

I turn, then, to the contention that s 414 (5) of the Income Tax Act 1952 relieves the bank from any obligation of answering questions 1 and 2. No point of any substance has arisen on the concluding words of the subsection. The issue has been that of the ambit of the words which prevent the section from imposing on the bank the obligation 'to furnish any particulars of any ordinary banking transactions between the bank and a customer carried out in the ordinary course of banking business'. Before I turn to the contentions put before me, let me say at the outset that this seems to me to be a strictly limited provision. The limitations may be ranged under four heads. First, the protection is given not to particulars at large but only to particulars of certain transactions: if the particulars sought are particulars not of any transaction but of the name and address of some person, unrelated to anything that could fairly be called a transaction, then they are outside the protection. Second, there is a limit as to the type of transaction: no transaction will suffice unless it falls within the expression 'ordinary banking transactions'. Third, there is a limit by reference to the parties: only transactions 'between the bank and a customer' qualify. Fourth, there is a limitation as to the circumstances in which the transaction is carried out, namely, that it was 'carried out in the ordinary course of banking business'. This language seems to me to be carefully guarded, having regard to the use of the words 'ordinary' and 'banking' twice over, and the cumulative limiting effect of all the phrases used. For the purposes of analysis, I may add, it is usually convenient to look separately at the constituent parts of a compound expression; but, of course, what must be construed is the expression read as a whole. b

As I have mentioned, the subsection first came into the legislation as s 17 (3) of the Finance Act 1939. As it stood then, it provided that 'Nothing in this section' was to impose the obligation of disclosure on the bank; and this is perhaps a little odd because at that time the general obligation of disclosure was imposed not by s 17 of that Act but by para 6 of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1936. What s 17 did, inter alia, was to declare, by sub-s (1), that the particulars that must be furnished under para 6 of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1936 included particulars as to transactions with respect to which the person on whom the notice was served was acting on behalf of others. In other words, reading the section literally, all that the bank was protected against was such extensions of the obligation under the Finance Act 1936, as were made by s 17 of the Finance Act 1939. However, when the statutes came to be consolidated in the Income Tax Act 1952, the opening words of the bank provision remained 'Nothing in this section', but there was included in the section not only what had been in s 17 of the Finance Act 1939, but also the basic obligation that para 6 of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1936 had created. As a matter of language, the words of protection remained unchanged, but the ambit of the obligation to which those words related was enlarged. The point is curious, but I doubt whether it has any real significance; and certainly it does not dispense me from considering the meaning of the words of exemption in question. c

Counsel for the commissioners laboured for some while to persuade me that it was a matter of law and of judicial notice whether any particular transaction fell within the words of exemption; but I remained unconvinced. No doubt the meaning of the statutory language is a question of law. No doubt the bounds of judicial notice are at times surprisingly wide. But the word 'ordinary', if nothing else, seems to me to stand in the path of counsel for the commissioners. I cannot see how questions as to what transactions are 'ordinary banking transactions' and which of d a them are 'carried out in the ordinary course of banking business' can possibly be matters of such notoriety that the courts will take judicial notice of them. If banking transactions and banking business, why not the manifold processes of manufacture or science, for example? Is the court to be treated as taking judicial notice of all the processes of science or manufacture, and also of which of these are 'ordinary'? Counsel for the commissioners relied on the camel case, *McQuaker v Goddard*², and especially on some language of Clauson LJ³; but I do not think that this supported him. It is one thing to say that the courts will take judicial notice of the ordinary course of nature, though evidence is admissible to aid the judge in the matter despite the complete knowledge of it that he is supposed to have; it is quite another to say that the court will take judicial notice of the ordinary course of all the artifices of man (many of which are extremely complex and obscure), whether they be banking, manufacture, scientific endeavour or otherwise. I may perhaps be permitted to observe that when I asked counsel for the commissioners for an explanation of the process of bond-washing, his answer took little less than an hour. I think counsel for the bank was right when he said that it was a question of mixed law and fact whether or not the matters in question before me fall within the statutory phrase. The question before Salmon J in *Woods v Martins Bank Ltd*⁴ was quite different, but I respectfully agree with his statement that 'the limits of a banker's business cannot be laid down as a matter of law'.

I was naturally referred to *United Dominions Trust Ltd v Kirkwood*⁵. In that case the main question was whether the plaintiffs, the well-known finance house that I shall call 'UDT', were excluded from the statutory definition of moneylenders by virtue of an exception for 'any person bona fide carrying on the business of banking'. The Court of Appeal was unanimous that it had not been shown that UDT's business had the usual characteristics of banking; but by a majority it was held that its reputation for carrying on the business of banking sufficed. The court described the usual characteristics of banking at the time, and it is plain that the transactions before me in this case do not fall within this description. However, the question in that case was entirely different from the question in the present case. Here, it is common ground that the plaintiff is a bank; the issue is not the status of the plaintiff but the nature of particular transactions. There, the whole issue was the status of the plaintiff and not the nature of individual transactions. To define the usual characteristics of banking today helps, of course, where the questioned transactions fall within those limits; but I do not think that there is any suggestion in this case that transactions outside those limits cannot be usual banking transactions. A statement of the essentials of a business does not seem to me, without more, to be exhaustive of all that is ordinary in that business. Accordingly, while of course I pay due attention to what was said in the UDT case⁵, I do not think it solves the problem before me.

Questions as to the ambit of the term 'ordinary banking transactions' are not made easier by the circumstance that at least on some views there are many different types of bank. According to one classification⁶, the two main groups are savings banks, such as the various trustee savings banks and the Post Office Savings Bank (now the National Savings Bank), and commercial banks. The latter may be classified as deposit banks (which include those commercial banks which are best known to the public as 'banks'), merchant banks, and industrial bankers. A transaction that to one type of bank may be ordinary may to another type be exceptional. Whether all these types of bank fall within what the law recognises as being a bank may indeed be a difficult question to resolve; the traditional view has been, and may well still be, that the payment of cheques drawn on the bank is of the essence of being a bank: see, for example the UDT case⁷. However, as I have mentioned, it is accepted that the plaintiff in the present case is a bank, and so falls within the words 'any bank' in sub-s (5). I therefore do not think that I need attempt to consider these difficulties except insofar as they throw any light on the particular transactions here in question in relation to the statute. I further bear in mind that this bank is a foreign bank with its headquarters in Canada, and also that the branch in question is in the heart of the City of London.

There is one other matter that I should mention in relation to sub-s (5). Many types of confidential relationship are, of course, generally recognised today. The powers given to the commissioners by s 414 appear to enable them to invade all such relationships save insofar as the section provides some protection. The only forms of protection so provided are in respect of solicitors, by sub-s (4), and in respect of banks, by sub-s (5). When one reads those subsections it becomes plain that Parliament has not only refrained from protecting every confidential relationship but also has not made the statutory protection coterminous with the cloak of confidentiality. A bank's duty of secrecy to its customers is not, as I understand it, confined to ordinary banking transactions, but would extend to any banking transaction which it effected for a customer, ordinary or extraordinary. Accordingly, in determining the ambit of sub-s (5) one cannot obtain much, if any, assistance from a consideration of the ambit of the banker's duty of secrecy, for the bounds of the duty and of the statutory protection are plainly not coincident.

It will be seen that there are thus a number of considerations which provide me with little direct assistance, though in differing degrees they make their contributions to the background of what I have to decide. I must now turn to consider the evidence that has been put before me. As I have already indicated, the only evidence consisted of the affidavits of three employees of the bank, Mr Smith, Mr Matheson and Mr Stuart, all filed on behalf of the bank, together with the cross-examination of the first two of these deponents, which occupied about a day in all. The commissioners adduced no evidence, and there was no independent evidence before me to assist me on the scope of banking, or on what was ordinary or extraordinary. I have to do the best I can on the evidence in fact before me. Counsel for the commissioners asserted and counsel for the bank accepted that the bank bore the burden of establishing that the case fell within sub-s (5), and so I must examine the evidence, particularly (though by no means exclusively) in relation to the statutory phrase 'ordinary banking transactions'.

Mr Smith's affidavit is mainly concerned with explaining the questions that have arisen, and describing various factual occurrences. But para 8 of his affidavit reads as follows:

'The receipt from customers of the Bank of instructions to take delivery of stock and to sell it is an event of very frequent occurrence. The Bank has maintained a Securities Department for very many years and one of the services which the Bank in common with practically every other bank known to me in the City of London offers to its customers is that of taking delivery of securities against payment and of giving instructions to brokers. In my considered opinion the transactions intended to be described in Mr. Stuart's said Affidavit disregarding for the moment questions of bond-washing are common form transactions which the vast majority of bankers would carry out in the ordinary course of the day's work without question. I should perhaps add that it is not uncommon for gilt edged securities to be dealt in in such substantial amounts as are mentioned in the [1969 notice] even though the person or company buying has not the resources to make such purchases without financial assistance. The gilt edged market would lose a great deal of its efficiency if it were not so.'

a Naturally much attention was given to the third sentence of this paragraph which, Mr Smith said in his oral evidence, was still his view today. He made, however, one qualification, namely, that in expressing that view he was, in addition to disregarding bond-washing, also disregarding an instruction given by Poinsettia that all sales had to be effected through a specified jobber. Under cross-examination he could not recollect any cases in which instructions such as these had been given. (I may here b interpose that the jobber appears to play an important part in bond-washing, though it has not been suggested that this ought to have made the bank suspect bond-washing.) The fact that the customer was resident outside the United Kingdom also made the transaction in some degree less usual; but what made the real difference was the specification of a particular jobber. It may also be observed that the words in Mr Smith's affidavit are 'common form transactions which the vast majority of bankers would carry out in the ordinary course of the day's work without question', whereas c the question before me is whether they are 'ordinary banking transactions'. Not every common form transaction by a bank is an ordinary banking transaction. Thus it is said in 2 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) p 151, note (g):

d '... Numerous other functions are undertaken at the present day by banks, such as the payment of domiciled bills, custody of valuables, discounting bills, executor and trustee business or acting in relation to stock exchange transactions, and banks have functions under certain financial legislation, e.g. by delegation under the Exchange Control Act, 1947 . . . , or as authorised dealers under that Act and subordinate legislation; see title MONEY. These functions are not strictly banking business . . .'

e Counsel for the commissioners strenuously sought to demonstrate that Mr Smith, a Canadian banker, had had too little experience of English banking to be a reliable guide in English banking matters; but I do not think he succeeded.

Mr Matheson's affidavit was short. The most material part of it was para 5. This states:

f 'The sale transactions in themselves were not exceptional for my Department to handle. It is one of the prime functions of this Department to deal on the Stock Exchange through brokers on behalf of the Bank's customers. Instructions for dealing are received in a wide variety of ways by post telephone or personal call and sometimes are received direct from customers and sometimes from their agents or other branches of the Bank. Purely by way of illustration my g Department received instructions to sell securities on behalf of customers on 35 occasions during the last eighteen working days before this Affidavit was sworn. Equally it is a common experience for my Department to receive instructions on behalf of a customer to accept securities from a named person or institution against payment. Such instructions were received on 68 occasions during the last eighteen working days.'

h Cross-examined on this paragraph, however, Mr Matheson agreed that the transactions here in question, whereby the bank was to receive the stock, pay for it and sell it, all at a blow (as distinct from instructions merely to sell, or instructions merely to accept securities and pay for them), were rather unusual and not an everyday occurrence. This, it seems to me, does much to negate the idea of 'ordinary banking transactions'.

j On the standards appropriate to civil cases, the result of applying the sum total of the evidence, the judicial notice that I may properly ascribe to myself, and the law as I understand it, is to leave me far from satisfied that these transactions were 'ordinary banking transactions'. They were transactions, and they were carried out by a bank; but I certainly do not accept that every transaction lawfully carried out by a bank is a 'banking transaction'. Furthermore, even if they were 'banking transactions',

I cannot regard them as being 'ordinary' banking transactions. I do not think it is for counsel for the commissioners to establish that they were 'unusual' or 'extraordinary' or whatever is the appropriate antithesis to 'ordinary': it is for counsel for the bank to show that they were 'ordinary'. If there is any no-man's-land between 'ordinary' on the one hand and 'extraordinary' or 'unusual' on the other hand, a transaction in that no-man's-land would thus not avail counsel for the bank: nothing will suffice him save a sufficient demonstration of ordinariness. In my judgment, there has been no such demonstration.

In the result, the answer to question 1 of the summons is that the plaintiff bank is bound to furnish all of the particulars required by the 1969 notice. Question 2 accordingly does not arise. Nor does there arise the question whether, if some of the particulars required by the notice are unauthorised by the statute and others are authorised, the presence of the unauthorised particulars invalidates the entire notice. However, the point has been fully argued, and it may be helpful if I say something about it. If one adopts the classification that I ventured in *Brunner v Greenslade*⁸, what I say now will be neither of the ratio nor merely obiter dicta, but what for want of a better term may be called judicial dicta. Counsel for the bank's contention that the answer to the question was Yes was founded on *Dyson v A-G*⁹, where the Court of Appeal held that the invalidity of a single question in a notice requiring certain returns to be made under the Finance (1909-10) Act 1910 invalidated the entire notice. In that case, six forms were served on the plaintiff, relating to six properties. The unauthorised question was worded so that it had to be answered only 'if the person making the return is also the occupier'; and for five of the properties this was not the case. In those five cases the presence of the unauthorised question did not invalidate the notice. It was only in the sixth case, where the owner was also the occupier, that the unauthorised question was held to invalidate the entire notice. The contention before me was that this sixth case applied in its essentials to the present case.

It seems to me that the respective statutory provisions are somewhat different. What is before me is a statute authorising the commissioners, 'by notice in writing', to require a person to furnish them, within a stated time, 'with such particulars as they think necessary', and so on; and the notice before me follows this language. The response to the statutory requirement is thus to be the furnishing of the particulars within the time. There is no form to be filled up, no requirement that all the particulars are to be supplied simultaneously, and no other formal requirement. The only question is whether the person concerned has or has not furnished the particulars within the time stated. The penalty is imposed by the Finance Act 1960, s 46 (1), if the person 'fails to comply with the notice'.

That may be contrasted with the Finance (1909-10) Act 1910, s 26 (2). The power was for the commissioners to require a person, 'by notice from the Commissioners', to 'furnish to the Commissioners a return containing such particulars as the Commissioners may require' as to the matters stated; and there was a penalty for failure 'to make such a return' within the time specified. The notice sent by the commissioners required a return to be made on the form accompanying the notice; and copies of what was called 'Form 4' were enclosed. This form contained a declaration that the particulars were 'in every respect fully and truly stated to the best of my judgment and belief', and referred to the penalty for 'failure to make a due return'. In those circumstances it is not surprising that in the Dyson case¹⁰ Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy MR said:

'The requirement is for a return containing an answer to all the particulars, including (i), and that is not authorized. The penalty is imposed for failure to make "such a return" as the Commissioners require. The return is one and a indivisible. No penalty could be exacted for omitting to make an unauthorized return. I decline to read the notice as requiring a return of the particulars so far and so far only as they can lawfully be required by the Commissioners.'

b 'But seeing that the demand is for the whole of the information and that the declaration which the plaintiff has to sign relates to the whole, and moreover contains words which are intended to refer expressly to this part of the notice, the presence of this unauthorized inquiry renders the whole demand bad. It certainly renders untrue the statement that there is a penalty for not making the return demanded.'

c Farwell LJ said¹²:

d 'The duty imposed by the Act on owners is to make such a return as is required by the Commissioners under a penalty of 50*l*. The duty and the penalty for disobedience are both one and indivisible and are co-extensive, and if the Commissioners frame their requisition with so little care as to exceed their powers, the whole demand and not merely the ultra vires portion becomes unenforceable. [He added:] It is impossible to split the requisition into good and bad, and hold that the demand may be good so far as the requisitions are good; the Act speaks of a return, not of part of a return, and gives a penalty for not making "such return" . . .'

e The Dyson case¹³ is thus authority for the proposition that the inclusion of an unauthorised demand in a return that is one and indivisible and has been demanded under statutory powers invalidates the entire requirement for making the return. The indivisible nature of the return is at the heart of all three judgments on this point. In the present case, there is no demand for the making of an indivisible return; instead, there is a requirement for the furnishing of 'particulars', and this seems to me to be distributive rather than unitary in its import. If the commissioners
f seek particulars of more than they are entitled to, I do not in principle see why their requirement should not be bad merely as to the excess. It may well be that if the excess is so entwined with the valid as to be separable from it only with difficulty, then the whole of the requirement will be bad: the subject ought not to be required to perform delicate feats of surgery on what is in substance a single requirement. But where, as here, the requirements are contained in a notice divided into numbered g paragraphs dealing with different matters, and the attack is made on one or more of such paragraphs, I do not see why the invalidity of those paragraphs, if established, should infect the other paragraphs, or why the notice should not be good as to the good paragraphs and bad as to the bad. Accordingly, had it been necessary to decide the point, I should have held that even if questions 3 and 4 in the notice were invalid, this would not invalidate questions 1 and 2. But as it is, the only answer that I make to h the originating summons is, as I have already indicated, to say "All" to question 1.

Ruling accordingly.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND BRIDGE JJ

16th, 17th NOVEMBER 1971

Harbour – Pilot – Pilotage district – Unlicensed pilot piloting ship after offer by licensed pilot – Ship being moved for purpose of changing from one mooring to another – Ship not navigating by virtue of pilotage district byelaws – Whether ship being 'piloted' by unlicensed pilot if not navigating – Pilotage Act 1913, ss 30, 32 – London Pilotage District Bye-Laws, Part IX, byelaw 2.

Harbour – Pilot – Pilotage district – Unlicensed pilot piloting ship after offer by licensed pilot – Offer – Communication of offer – Offer to be communicated in relation to particular movement of ship – General offer to all masters requiring pilots that pilots available not sufficient – Pilotage Act 1913, s 30 (3).

The appellant, a waterman licensed by the Port of London Authority but not a pilot licensed for the London pilotage district, piloted a vessel of about 3,647 tons gross from moorings at Erith buoys to her discharge berth at Ford's jetty, a distance of less than 2 nautical miles. Erith buoys and Ford's jetty lay within the London pilotage district. The Trinity House pilot station at Gravesend, which displayed a sign saying 'Pilots' and a metal pilot flag, was some 9 nautical miles down river from Erith buoys and thus could not be seen from a vessel moving from Erith buoys to Ford's jetty. At that pilot station there were at the material time licensed pilots available, ready and willing to pilot the vessel. The appellant knew of the existence of the pilot station and of the availability of licensed pilots but licensed watermen, including the appellant, had for many years piloted ships in similar circumstances. The appellant was charged with contravening s 30 (3)^a of the Pilotage Act 1913. The appellant contended (i) that s 30 (3) did not apply since the effect of the provision in byelaw 2^b of Part IX of the London Pilotage District Bye-Laws (made under s 32^c of the Act) that a vessel 'being moved for the purpose of changing from one mooring to another mooring . . . in the part of the District between London Bridge and Gravesend shall not be deemed to be navigating in the District, and shall . . . be exempt from Compulsory Pilotage', was to release an unlicensed pilot from the obligation under s 30 to give way to a licensed pilot; (ii) that the sign and the flag displayed at the pilot station did not constitute an offer of pilotage for the purposes of s 30 (3). The justices, having accepted, inter alia, the respondent's contention that byelaw 2 was inapplicable on the basis that it was concerned only with exemption from compulsory pilotage and not with a licensed pilot's right to supersede an unlicensed pilot, convicted the appellant. On appeal,

Held – The appeal would be allowed and the conviction quashed for the following reasons—

^a Section 30 (3) provides: 'If in any pilotage district a pilot not licensed for the district pilots or attempts to pilot a ship after a pilot licensed for that district has offered to pilot the ship, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds.'

^b Byelaw 2 is set out at p 243 c, post

^c Section 32, so far as material, provides: '(1) A ship while being moved within a harbour which forms part of a pilotage district shall be deemed to be a ship navigating in a pilotage district, except so far as may be provided by byelaw in the case of ships being so moved for the purpose of changing from one mooring to another mooring or of being taken into or out of any dock: Provided that a byelaw shall in every case be made for the purpose aforesaid in any pilotage district where any class of persons other than licensed pilots were in practice employed at the date of the passing of this Act for the purpose of changing the moorings of ships or of taking ships into or out of dock.'

- a (i) an unlicensed pilot conducting a vessel on a movement exempted by a byelaw made under s 32 was protected by that section from prosecution under s 30; no question of a vessel being under the control of a pilot, whether licensed or unlicensed could arise at a time when a vessel was deemed not to be navigating (see p 243 h, p 244 a b d and f, and p 245 a and b, post);
- b (ii) a global offer of pilotage, such as that made by the licensed pilots at the Gravesend pilot station, was not a sufficient offer to provide pilotage for the purposes of s 30 (3); for the purposes of that subsection it was essential that a specific offer should be made or communicated in relation to the particular movement of the vessel in question (see p 244 h and p 245 a b and d, post).

- f This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices acting in and for the petty sessional division of Beacontree in the North East London Area in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Barking on 24th May 1971.
- On 23rd November 1970 an information was preferred by the respondent, Edward Babbs, against the appellant, Raymond Frank Montague, charging that he on 7th June 1970 not being a pilot licensed for the district piloted the motor vessel Minster from Erith buoys to Ford's jetty, Dagenham, within the limits of the London pilotage district after a pilot licensed for the district had offered to pilot the ship contrary to s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913.
- g The following facts were found. The Minster was a motor vessel of about 3,647 tons gross and at all material times was still laden with her cargo of coal. The appellant was a waterman licensed by the Port of London Authority. On 7th June 1970 the appellant piloted the Minster from moorings at Erith buoys to her discharge berth at Ford's jetty, Dagenham, where she moored. Erith buoys and Ford's jetty, Dagenham, were situated between Barking Creek and Gravesend and were geographically within the London pilotage district. The distance between Erith buoys and Ford's jetty, Dagenham, was less than 2 nautical miles. At all material times there was a Trinity House pilot station at Royal Terrace Pier, Gravesend. The pilot station was at all material times clearly marked by a sign saying 'Pilots' and by a metal pilot flag.
- j At all material times there were available at the pilot station licensed pilots who were ready, able and willing to pilot the Minster from Erith buoys to Ford's jetty as aforesaid. The pilot station was some 9 nautical miles down-river of Erith buoys and in the circumstances could not be seen from vessels moving from Erith buoys to Ford's jetty, Dagenham. At all material times the appellant knew of the existence of the pilot station and of the availability of licensed pilots.

Licensed watermen including the appellant had for many years piloted ships in circumstances similar to those in the present case. a

It was contended on behalf of the appellant: that s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913 was inapplicable because of byelaw 2 of Part IX of the London Pilotage District Bye-Laws which provides:

‘A ship while being moved for the purpose of changing from one mooring to another mooring or of being taken into or out of any dock in the part of the District between London Bridge and Gravesend shall not be deemed to be navigating in the District, and shall accordingly be exempt from Compulsory Pilotage provided that between Barking Creek and Gravesend the above exemption shall not apply to ships which are being moved for a distance exceeding two nautical miles.’ b

if the byelaw did not have the effect of making s 30 (3) inapplicable in cases such as the present the byelaw would confer no benefit at all on licensed watermen and watermen would never be able to shift vessels when there had been an offer of pilotage; that the sign and flag did not and could not constitute an offer of pilotage for the purposes of s 30 (3). c

It was contended on behalf of the respondent: that the byelaw was inapplicable as it was only concerned with exemption from compulsory pilotage and not with a licensed pilot's right to supersede an unlicensed pilot; that in any event the byelaw only applied to vessels being moved between the completion of an inward voyage and before the commencement of an outward voyage and not to a case such as this where a ship had moored just short of her point of discharge; that the sign and flag constituted an offer of pilotage for the purposes of s 30 (3). d

The justices accepted the contention of the respondent and convicted the appellant. e

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from justices of the petty sessional division of Beacontree sitting at Barking in respect of their adjudication on 24th May 1971. By their adjudication they convicted the appellant of an offence under s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913, the information against him charging that he on 7th June 1970 not being a pilot licensed for the district piloted the motor vessel Minster from Erith buoys to Ford's jetty, Dagenham, within the limits of the London pilotage district after a pilot licensed for the district had offered to pilot the ship contrary to the section to which I have referred. f

The facts found were these: the Minster was a motor vessel incoming with a cargo of coal, and at the material time her cargo of coal was still on board. She had in fact been unable to reach her final destination, which was Ford's jetty, Dagenham, owing to the berth being full, and she had secured at Erith buoys short of her destination on that account. The appellant is a waterman licensed by the Port of London Authority. Erith buoys, at which the ship tied up, and her ultimate destination at Dagenham, are both situate between Barking Creek and Gravesend and thus geographically within the London pilotage district. The distance between Erith buoys and the jetty at Dagenham is less than 2 miles, and at all material times there was a Trinity House pilot station at Gravesend. This pilot station was displaying a sign saying 'Pilots' and a metal pilot flag, and the justices found: g

‘At all material times there were available at the said Pilot Station licensed pilots who were ready, able and willing to pilot the “Minster” from Erith Buoys to Ford's Jetty as aforesaid. The said Pilot Station is some 9 nautical miles downriver of Erith Buoys . . .’ h a And in the circumstances, the justices give us a glimpse of the obvious by stating that the station cannot be seen from a vessel moving from Erith Buoy to Ford's jetty. Finally they state: 'At all material times the Appellant knew of the existence of the said Pilot Station and of the availability of licensed pilots' but nevertheless piloted the ship to Ford's jetty.

b It was contended on behalf of the appellant before the justices that s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913 was inapplicable to this movement, and did not impose on him the obligation of giving way to a licensed pilot, by virtue of byelaw 2 of Part IX of the London Pilotage District Bye-Laws. That I should read, because it has some considerable relevance. It provides:

c 'A ship while being moved for the purpose of changing from one mooring to another mooring or of being taken into or out of any dock in the part of the District between London Bridge and Gravesend shall not be deemed to be navigating in the District, and shall accordingly be exempt from Compulsory Pilotage provided that between Barking Creek and Gravesend the above exemption shall not apply to ships which are being moved for a distance exceeding two nautical miles.'

d The argument for the appellant was that this movement of the Minster came within the exemption provision of that byelaw, and that as a consequence, in the appellant's submission, his obligation to give way to a licensed pilot under s 30 did not arise.

e The respondent contended that the byelaw was not applicable first, on a broad submission that s 30 is independent of the rest of the Act and is not affected by exemptions conferred by the byelaws, and secondly, on a more limited ground that even if that argument were wrong the movement of the ship from Erith buoys to Dagenham was not a movement within the byelaw, the respondent relying on authority to the effect that a ship which has not yet reached her destination, but has stopped short for some reason, is not within the terms of the byelaw when she makes the final and concluding move to her destination.

f The justices accepted the contention of the respondent; in so doing, of course, they accepted that the existence of the pilot station at Gravesend, managed in the manner which they described, was a sufficient offer of a licensed pilot to satisfy the requirement of s 30 and they then accordingly convicted the appellant.

g The justices' decision was given before these matters were debated in this court in *Babbs v Press*¹. I gave the leading judgment in *Babbs v Press*¹, and I do not find it necessary or appropriate to repeat now in detail everything which I said on that occasion. I take the liberty of hoping that anyone reading this present judgment will realise that he must read it in the light of *Babbs v Press*¹.

h On that footing three matters have been canvassed before us which require some individual consideration. First of all I should say that in *Babbs v Press*¹ this court rejected the first argument of the respondent to which I referred a few moments ago. In that earlier decision we held that a movement within the terms of the exempting byelaw was a movement to which the restrictions of s 30 did not apply. For my part I would regard myself as bound by the decision in *Babbs v Press*¹, but in any event, notwithstanding such argument as there has been on the point today, I adhere to that view. I say 'notwithstanding such argument as there has been' because there has been virtually no argument on this point, the court taking the view that it should regard itself as bound by *Babbs v Press*¹.

j I would wish to add a few words only on this point in order to deal somewhat more fully with a point made by counsel for the appellant in that case, to which I fear I did not do justice in the judgment in *Babbs v Press*¹. It is this: s 32 of the Pilotage Act 1913, under which the byelaw is made, provides first of all in general terms that a ship being moved within a harbour shall be deemed to be navigating in the pilotage district except so far as byelaws may be made exempting such movements where a ship is changing from one mooring to another or being taken into or out of any dock. The section goes on to provide:

'Provided that a bye-law [on these lines] shall . . . be made . . . in any pilotage district where any class of persons other than licensed pilots were in practice employed at the date of the passing of this Act for the purpose of changing the moorings of ships or taking ships into or out of dock.'

I read that (and indeed read that in the course of argument in *Babbs v Press*²) as being a provision for the protection of certain classes of men employed on the river who had before 1913 been in the habit of conducting ships in movements of this kind.

The importance of the point is this, that where a movement of a ship comes within the exempting byelaw it is agreed on all hands that what are familiarly called the compulsory pilotage provisions of s 11 of the Act do not apply. Accordingly, where a movement of a ship comes within the exempting byelaw a licensed pilot who presents himself and offers to take over the ship and who is rejected by the master does not give occasion for prosecution of the master under s 11, because the offence there created, which can be described in general terms as allowing a ship to be moved by an unqualified man after offer by a licensed pilot, cannot arise.

If the argument of the respondent in *Babbs v Press*² that these considerations do not apply to s 30 is right, then it seems to me that the protection of s 32 will be wholly nugatory because a waterman conducting the vessel on a movement exempted by the byelaw may be protected from prosecution, as may be the master of the ship, so far as s 11 is concerned, but he will be liable to prosecution under s 30. Counsel for the respondent has been unable to provide any illustration of a movement of a ship in which the protection of s 32 could extend to an unlicensed pilot having regard to his interpretation of s 30. I wish to make it clear that my somewhat brief reference to this point in *Babbs v Press*² is really based on that consideration, as it seems to me highly unlikely that Parliament would have given on the one hand in s 32 only to take away with the other hand in s 30.

The second point which arises in the present case is the argument of counsel for the respondent that even if the byelaw exemption is relevant to this kind of prosecution at all, it is not significant in the present instance as the movement from Erith buoys to Dagenham cannot have been a movement within the terms of the byelaw. This raises an interesting point and one which may give rise to further discussion another day, but having regard to the view which I take on the third and final point, I find it unnecessary to say anything more about it.

The third point, on which in any event in my judgment this appeal must succeed, is again a point which was raised and dealt with, albeit obiter, in *Babbs v Press*³. It arises in this way. The offence charged against the appellant under s 30 (3) is committed only if a licensed pilot has offered his services and the unlicensed pilot nevertheless continues to handle the ship. Accordingly, if the respondent is right on his construction of the Act, it is still necessary in order that he may succeed, for him to show that the justices were right in the view which the justices took that an offer by a licensed pilot had been made in the circumstances found in this case. I content myself by saying that I would repeat everything which I said obiter in *Babbs v Press*³ on this point. For the reasons which I there gave and which I do not find it necessary to repeat, I am of the opinion that the global offer made by the assembled pilots at the Gravesend pilot station is not an offer within the meaning of s 30 (3) for the purposes of the movement of this ship which is in question in this case. In my judgment that concludes the matter in any event in favour of the appellant, whatever the result of the argument on the other points may be, and I would accordingly allow the appeal and quash the conviction.

a ASHWORTH J. I agree; I would only say that on the question whether there was an offer to pilot the ship within the meaning of s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913 I have felt perhaps more doubt than Lord Widgery CJ and Bridge J, but I agree with the result and with the order which Lord Widgery CJ proposes.

b BRIDGE J. I also agree. Counsel for the respondent's argument that an offer of the services of a pilot by a global advertisement of the location and availability of pilots is effective for the purposes of s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913 as an offer to all who are de facto aware of it, seems to me to be contrary to the scheme of the 1913 Act. Lord Widgery CJ pointed out in his obiter observations on this point in *Babbs v Press*⁴ the distinction which is drawn in s 30 (4) between the position of the master of a ship employing an unlicensed pilot on an outward bound voyage which will constitute an offence by him if he has not taken reasonable steps to obtain a licensed pilot, c and his position on an inward voyage in which he will only commit an offence by employing an unlicensed pilot if he has previously had the offer of a licensed one. For my part I find it impossible to understand how that distinction can validly be drawn if counsel for the respondent's argument is right.

d I find further support for the conclusion, as Lord Widgery CJ put it in *Babbs v Press*⁵, that an offer for the purposes of sub-s (3) must be an offer made or communicated in relation to the particular movement of the vessel which is in question, in the provisions of ss 43 and 44. Section 43 (1) places on the master of the ship the obligation—

'when navigating in circumstances in which pilotage is compulsory under this Act, [to] display a pilot signal, and keep the signal displayed . . .'

e indicating that he requires a pilot. Section 44 envisages how the services of a pilot are to be offered to him. I need not read the section; it contemplates a visual signal being made, possibly from a shore station, more likely from a pilot cutter, to a ship which is navigating and displaying the appropriate signal. When the master of the ship has received such a signal he is then to facilitate the pilot getting on board the f ship. What is quite clearly not contemplated, to my mind, is the means of offer and acceptance envisaged by counsel for the respondent's argument, namely an offer by an advertisement which is known to the master of the ship and the unlicensed pilot and acceptance by a telephone message. I agree that this appeal should be allowed on the ground that there was no offer.

g Appeal allowed. Conviction quashed. The court certified under s 1 (2) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 that a point of law of general public importance was involved, ie (i) whether under s 30 of the Pilotage Act 1913 a pilot licensed for the district might supersede any pilot not so licensed who was employed to pilot a ship in the district notwithstanding the provisions of a byelaw made under s 32; (ii) whether for the purposes of offering to pilot a ship under s 30 (3) a pilot licensed for the district could rely on a general offer of pilotage within the district or had to make a specific offer in relation to the particular ship in question, and granted leave h to appeal to the House of Lords.

Case referred to in judgment

Babbs v Press [1971] 3 All ER 654, [1971] 1 WLR 1739.

This was an appeal by way of case stated by the justices acting in and for the petty sessional division of Dartford in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Dartford on 12th May 1971.

On 26th February 1971 an information was preferred by the respondent, Daniel Ivor McMillan, against the appellant, William James Crouch, charging that he on 24th October 1970 on board the ship Wadhurst lying at Littlebrook power station in the parish of Stone in the county of Kent, during and after the departure of the ship from Littlebrook power station did pilot the ship after a licensed pilot for the district had offered to pilot the ship contrary to s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913.

The justices heard the information on 12th May 1971. The case came before them as a test case. The material facts were not in dispute. They were as follows. The Wadhurst was at all material times a ship of about 3,900 tons gross. The respondent and a witness, Maxwell Lamont Brown, were both duly licensed Trinity House river pilots, licensed to pilot vessels in that part of the River Thames with which this case was concerned. The appellant was a waterman licensed by the Port of London Authority. The part of the river within which the Wadhurst was moved on 24th October was geographically wholly within the London Pilotage District which was a district where (subject to certain exceptions) pilotage of vessels was compulsory, and that it was geographically between Barking Creek and Gravesend. At or about 16.15 hours on 24th October 1970 the respondent and the pilot Brown both being in uniform boarded the Wadhurst as she lay moored alongside the jetty at Littlebrook power station and the respondent offered to the master to pilot the Wadhurst from her moorings at Littlebrook power station to moorings at Cory's wharf (a distance of about $\frac{3}{4}$ mile); at or about 16.50 hours the appellant boarded the ship and was made aware of the offer. The offer was not accepted by the master of the Wadhurst having been instructed by his owners to take the services of the appellant. The respondent and pilot Brown left the vessel. From the jetty at Littlebrook power station the respondent and pilot Brown saw the vessel depart from the jetty and saw and heard the appellant giving the requisite helm and engine orders for moving the vessel to Cory's wharf where she was again moored. At no time when the vessel was moved as aforesaid was a licensed Trinity House river pilot on board her.

a It was contended on behalf of the appellant that by reason of byelaw 2^a of certain byelaws, Part IX relating to the London pilotage district, the appellant was entitled to move the vessel as and when he did despite the respondent's offer of his services and that s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913 had no application to such a situation.

b It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the aforementioned byelaws related according to the heading thereof only to exemptions from compulsory pilotage and that this case was concerned, not with compulsory pilotage, but with the right of a licensed pilot to supersede an unlicensed pilot once an unlicensed pilot had been taken.

c It was contended on behalf of the appellant that byelaw 2 dealt with an entirely different class of exemption from byelaw 1^b and that if a licensed pilot could always supersede an unlicensed pilot (e.g. a licensed waterman) then byelaw 2 would be wholly ineffective.

c It was contended on behalf of the respondent that this interpretation was not correct because a master in a situation coming within byelaw 2 could move his ship without the necessity in law of taking a pilot. If however he did choose to take a pilot when he need not, and that pilot was unlicensed then a licensed pilot had a right to supersede him.

d The justices accepted the contentions of the respondent and convicted the appellant accordingly.

e LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from justices acting in and for the petty sessional division of Dartford in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Dartford on 12th May 1971, whereby they convicted the appellant of an offence under s 30 (3) of the Pilotage Act 1913, the terms of the information against the appellant being these:

f 'On the 24th day of October 1970 on board the ship "WADHURST" lying at Littlebrook Power Station in the Parish of Stone in the County of Kent, during and after the departure of the said ship from Littlebrook Power Station did pilot the said ship after a Licensed Pilot for the district had offered to pilot the ship contrary to sub-section (3) of Section 30 of the Pilotage Act 1913.'

g The case has obviously been prepared as a test case, and the essential matters of fact were found by the justices. They are that two pilots duly licensed by Trinity House approached the master of the ship Wadhurst at a time when the ship was about to be moved a distance of three-quarters of a mile in the London pilotage district of the River Thames. The offer of pilotage given by these two gentlemen was rejected by the master of the ship on instructions from his owners, and the ship was moved down the river by the appellant, who was not a licensed pilot.

h The case has not been argued in any detail before us, because it is agreed by counsel on both sides that if this court considers that it should follow its own decision in *Babbs v Press*¹ that decision wholly disposes of the argument in the present case. On *Babbs v Press*¹ this court reached a conclusion on the construction of the Pilotage Act 1913 which would produce a result different from that achieved by the Dartford justices in the instant case. We think we should follow our decision in *Babbs v Press*¹, and consequently have no alternative but to say that the justices were wrong; to allow the appeal, and to quash the conviction.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
RUSSELL, SACHS AND STAMP LJ
5th, 6th OCTOBER, 5th NOVEMBER 1971

Landlord and tenant – Lease – Renewal – Perpetual right of renewal – Lease for five years with option to renew for further period of five years on the same terms 'as are herein contained (including an option to renew such lease for the further term of five years at the expiration thereof)' – Whether lease perpetually renewable – Law of Property Act 1922, Sch 15, para 5. e

The defendant was the lessee of industrial land of which he had been tenant since 1949 under successive five year leases each containing an option to renew for a further five year term. In 1957 he let the land to the plaintiffs on a weekly oral tenancy at a rental of 30s per week. On 6th May 1963 the lessor granted the defendant a further five year term from 1st January 1963. In 1966 the plaintiffs purchased the freehold of the land from the lessor, subject to the 1963 lease. The 1963 lease contained an option to renew (cl 4 (3)) in the following terms: '... the landlord will on the written request of the tenant made six months before the expiration of the term hereby created and if there shall not at the time of such request be any existing breach or non-observance of any of the covenants on the part of the tenant hereinbefore contained ... grant to him a lease of the said demised land for the further term of five years from the expiration of the said term hereby granted at the same rent and containing the like covenants and provisos as are herein contained (including an option to renew such lease for the further term of five years at the expiration thereof)...'. The defendant not having given the plaintiffs six months' notice of his intention to exercise the option the plaintiffs notified him that they were treating the lease as at an end and that they did not intend to pay any further rent under the sub-tenancy. f

Held – (i) The words in brackets in the covenant made it plain that the phrase 'the same or like covenants and provisos' was intended to include in the second five year term an option to renew; if the second lease repeated the words of the covenant without the words in brackets, the second lease would not be carrying out the requirement of the first lease, i.e. would not be granting an option for a further lease containing 'the like covenants ... as herein contained'; accordingly the second lease must also contain the covenant in cl 4 (3) and therefore the terms of the first lease were such g

- f This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, Caerphilly Concrete Products Ltd, from an order of Foster J dated 22nd March 1971 refusing the plaintiffs' application by originating summons for a declaration that the defendant tenant, Frederick William Owen, was not entitled to a perpetually renewable lease of the demised land under Sch 15, para 5, to the Law of Property Act 1922. The defendant was the original lessee of the land but the plaintiffs were not the original lessors. The facts so far as relevant were as follows. A lease of the land in question for 99 years from 1894 had become vested in one Hopkins on 18th March 1947. On 23rd February 1949 he sublet the land to the defendant for five years at a yearly rent of £10 payable by one payment of £50, with a covenant to renew on the same terms for a further five years. Further subleases for five years from 1st July 1953 contained the same option. On 23rd July 1955 Mr Hopkins purchased the freehold and merged the lease; the sublease, therefore, became the headlease. In 1957 the defendant orally sublet the land to the plaintiffs at a weekly rental of 30s. On 1st February 1958 Mr Hopkins granted the defendant a further five years lease on the same terms with an option to renew on the same terms. Final renewal was on 6th May 1963 when Mr Hopkins granted a new lease to the defendant. On 8th February 1966 the plaintiffs purchased the freehold from Mr Hopkins subject to the 1963 lease. The defendant not having given the plaintiffs notice of their intention to renew under the terms of the 1963 lease the plaintiffs informed him that his lease was ending and that they would not pay any further rent under the sub-tenancy. It appeared that after the plaintiffs had informed the defendant that the lease was at an end the defendant's solicitor sent to the plaintiffs a cheque for £50 which sum was acknowledged by someone in the accounts section of the plaintiffs' company. The defendant claimed that the lease was perpetually renewable in which case no notice was necessary as, under the provisions of the Law of Property Act 1922, the term had been converted into a term of 2,000 years.

5th November. The following judgments were read.

RUSSELL LJ. This appeal from Foster J raises the question whether the terms of a lease are such as to create a perpetually renewable lease, and consequently by force of the Law of Property Act 1922, Sch 15, para 5, confer on the tenant a 2,000 year term.

The lease in question is dated 6th May 1963. One Hopkins was the lessor and the defendant Owen the lessee. It was for a term of five years from 1st January 1963 at a rent of £10 yearly payable in advance in one sum of £50. The premises were an area of 4,800 square feet in an industrial area in Caerphilly. The defendant had been previously lessee of the property from Mr Hopkins under a succession of leases in similar terms, and in 1957 had sublet the premises to the plaintiffs at a weekly rental of 30s. In 1966 the plaintiffs bought the freehold of the premises; and the plaintiffs contend that on the expiration of the five year term they are no longer since January 1968 liable to pay the 30s weekly rental to the defendant. The defendant admittedly had at least an option for another five years from January 1968, but had failed to give due notice exercising that option; but the defendant contends that the lease of 1963 was perpetually renewable, in which case notice was not necessary because of the 2,000 year term. I add that there is a secondary point that arises if there was no perpetually renewable lease and, therefore, no 2,000 year term because of a payment of £50 by way of rent for a period after January 1968, apparently accepted as such by the plaintiffs. This may prevent the plaintiffs in any event from contending that they ceased to be the lessees of the defendant at 30s weekly in January 1968; but that point is in any event not now for decision.

The 1963 lease contained a number of covenants, provisos and conditions which do not I think call for special notice. I am not sure at what stage in the history of the Hopkins to the defendant leases a shed was erected on the premises by the defendant, but presumably it was before 1957, thus justifying a weekly rent of 30s charged in the subletting by the defendant to the plaintiffs. The crucial clause is cl 4 (3) which was in the following terms:

'The landlord hereby covenants with the tenant as follows: . . . (3) That the landlord will on the written request of the tenant made six months before the expiration of the term hereby created and if there shall not at the time of such request be any existing breach or non-observance of any of the covenants on the part of the tenant hereinbefore contained at the expense of the tenant grant to him a lease of the said demised land for the further term of five years from the expiration of the said term hereby granted at the same rent and containing the like covenants and provisos as are herein contained (including an option to renew such lease for the further term of five years at the expiration thereof) the tenant on the execution of such renewed lease to execute a counterpart thereof.'

Here then is the short point. When the time comes for the grant of the second five year term, is that grant to include cl 4 (3) including the parentheses? In that case a we have a perpetually renewable lease. Or is it to include cl 4 (3) without the parentheses or an option in some other terms, in which case there is provision in the 1963 lease for three periods of five years and no more. The approach to the question whether a lease is perpetually renewable is not in doubt. The language used must plainly lead to that result; although the fact that an argument is capable of being sustained at some length against that result does not of course suffice.

b As a matter of history, when a covenant by a lessor conferred a right to renewal of the lease, the new grant to contain the same or the like covenants and provisos as were contained in the lease, the courts refused to give literal effect to that language, which if taken literally would mean that the second lease would contain the same covenant (or option) to renew, totidem verbis, and so on perpetually. The reference to the same covenants was construed as not including the option covenant itself.
c This limited the tenant's right to one renewal. In order, therefore, to make it plain that the covenants to be contained in the second lease (to be granted under the exercise of the option to renew) were to include also the covenant to renew, draftsmen were accustomed to insert phrases such as 'including this covenant', so as to achieve a perpetually renewable lease. As I have indicated, if they did not do this, the second lease would not contain any option clause. The operation of the words of inclusion
d was not limited to requiring the second lease to contain a covenant to renew once more only, which would have been the outcome if the words of inclusion had been omitted in the second lease. This was because the words of inclusion could not properly be construed as requiring the second lease to contain the same covenants other than the covenant to renew but additionally to include an option to renew once more only—a total of three terms. The words of inclusion defined or explained
e what was meant by 'the same covenants', that is to say, as including the covenant to renew. Consequently in the second lease, in order to comply with the words of definition or explanation, the covenants referred to therein to be contained in the second lease must contain the same wording including the inclusion.

In the present case the brackets make it abundantly plain that the parties are explaining that 'the same or like covenants and provisos' is a phrase intended to embrace an option. That is to say that the covenants and provisos contained in the f first lease which the first lease requires the second lease to contain are not to be construed as a reference to those covenants and provisos other than an option to renew, but as a reference to all those covenants including an option to renew. But what covenant in the first lease (to be repeated in the second) can be regarded as such except cl 4 (3)? The second lease must contain the cl 4 (3) covenant. When the g cl 4 (3) covenant speaks of 'the like covenants and conditions' it defines them as including an option to renew. If the words of cl 4 (3) are repeated in the second lease without the words in parentheses the second lease will not be carrying out the requirement of the first lease; it will not be granting an option for a further lease containing 'the like covenants . . . as herein contained'.

It was argued that if this was intended the draftsman would have used the well-known phrase '(including this covenant)'. It is true that he might have done so, and that on this view he may be accused of verbosity. But on the other view the draftsman would be guilty of including the option in the like covenants when he simply meant the second lease to contain an option to renew, and further of failing adequately to define the terms and conditions for the exercise of this independent second and last option.

j In my judgment the only reasonable construction of the language of cl 4 (3) is such as to lead to a perpetually renewable lease, and accordingly in my view the appeal fails.

SACHS LJ. The question for determination in this appeal is whether the lease of 6th May 1963 is, on a proper construction of cl 4 (3), a perpetually renewable lease. That clause, so far as relevant, provides:

'That the landlord will on the written request of the tenant made six months before the expiration of the term hereby created . . . at the expense of the tenant grant to him a lease of the said demised land for the further term of five years from the expiration of the said term hereby granted at the same rent and containing the like covenants and provisos as are herein contained (including an option to renew such lease for the further term of five years at the expiration thereof) . . .'

I, too, emphasise the words in brackets. It is trite to say that when construing a document such as a lease it is the prime purpose of the courts to seek to adopt a meaning that conforms to the intentions of the parties. Not even the most impeccable conveyancing logic, however neatly expressed, can convince me that in the instant case it was the mutual intention of the parties that the lease should be perpetually renewable. So far as the landlord is concerned it seems to me highly unlikely that he really intended that this particular lease could or should be 'for ever'. My doubts on this question of intention extend also to the tenant—for I would acquit him of any intent to lay a trap through the operation of the words enclosed in the brackets, which we know to have been added to the draft at the very last moment by his solicitors. It is difficult, indeed, at any rate so far as I am concerned, to think that two businessmen would be talking in terms of five years if both—or indeed either—of them truly meant that a lease should be granted which went on ad infinitum. Were I in a position to give effect to the views just expressed, that would result in the landlord succeeding in this appeal; but it is necessary to consider whether the authorities which were so fully and so helpfully cited to us permit such a result.

An examination of the relevant decisions discloses an area of law in which the courts have manoeuvred themselves into an unhappy position. On the one hand in judgment after judgment, for instance, in *Baynham v Guy's Hospital*¹, *Moore v Foley*², and *Swinburne v Milburn*³, it has been proclaimed that the courts lean against holding that a lease is to that extent renewable. On the other hand, by strict adherence to precedent relating to the phrase 'including the present covenant' when following a covenant conferring a right to renewal on the like covenants and provisos as are contained in the first lease, they appear to have bound themselves to hold that the use of a certain set of words (to which I will refer as 'the formula') causes the lease to be perpetually renewable, even when no layman—at least if he has some elementary knowledge of business—would dream of granting such a lease and if aware of the meaning of the technical effect of the particular phraseology would almost certainly be aghast at its devastating effect and refuse to sign. One reason for the courts so binding themselves is said to be that the formula is one the effect of which is well known to trained conveyancers, and that this is advantageous, however much of a trap it may constitute for others.

As already mentioned, the prime purpose of the courts when construing a lease is to interpret it according to the true intentions of the parties. Already 20 years ago judicial unease at having to determine those intentions in cases of the instant type by a blinkered approach is reflected in the judgments in Re Greenwood's Agreement, *Parkus v Greenwood*⁴, both at first instance and on appeal. At first instance it fell to Harman J to discuss the decision reached in *Green v Palmer*⁵. There Uthwatt J had declined to hold that the formula produced a perpetually renewable lease when the original a tenancy had been for six months and related to furnished premises. In his judgment Harman J not unnaturally said⁶ of that earlier case:

'That was an instance of a furnished tenancy for six months, and the improbability that the parties had thought of creating a 2,000 years' term was very high.'

b He made a similar observation with regard to the lease he was himself considering, which was for three years with a renewal covenant for a further three years phrased in a way that accorded with the formula, saying⁷:

c 'It is said that [the plaintiff], as assignee under these two documents of the term of three years, has got, not a three years term, but a 2,000 years term in the property. If that be the result in law, it is one not contemplated by the parties when they made the original agreement, for it is clear that, if people wish to create a term of 2,000 years, they are very unlikely to do it by creating a term of three years with a right to renew.'

This view he implemented by holding that the use of the formula in relation to that lease did not result in it being perpetually renewable.

d On appeal his judgment was reversed and that of Uthwatt J⁸ was in substance disapproved. Sir Raymond Evershed MR, however, at the outset of his judgment said⁹:

e 'HARMAN, J., came to the conclusion that there was sufficient material to be found in the language of the document (and the intention of the parties which he discerned from the document) to avoid a conclusion which plainly, I think, he felt to involve almost an absurdity; and I confess that I feel sympathy with the learned judge.'

f Having referred later in his judgment to the formula as a long established 'matter of conveyancing machinery' and having related that logical march of case law which Russell LJ has so clearly recited, he spoke¹⁰ of the inclination of judges 'to avoid a result which on the face of it would appear unlikely to have been contemplated by the parties'. He spoke specifically of *Green v Palmer*⁸ as being a case where that inclination would have been even stronger than in the one with which he was dealing. Nonetheless, despite the qualms thus expressed, he felt bound to come to the conclusion that the lease was 'having regard to the formula a perpetually renewable lease'. In essence it was thus held that on the issue of the intentions of the parties the law had become the prisoner of the machinery.

g The judicial unease of 1950 is by now, so far as I am concerned, increased by two factors. Firstly, more and more leases over the two succeeding decades have tended to come from pens not fully trained in the art of conveyancing. Secondly, over the same period the value of the pound sterling has been decreasing rapidly, thus making it even more unlikely that a man of business in the course of a normal transaction would knowingly part 'for ever' with his rights over land in return for a static rent. h Moreover, when residential property is concerned a landlord could, indeed, now find himself in the position of having to relinquish a freehold when the document which he signed appeared on the face of it to be a lease for relatively short periods of years.

j In those circumstances I, too, have great sympathy with the line of approach adopted by Uthwatt J⁸ and Harman J⁷. I could wish that the courts had followed the apparent preference of Lord FitzGerald in *Swinburne v Milburn*¹¹ for confining interpretations of perpetual renewability to leases where words such as 'for ever' or 'from time to time for ever hereafter' or some equivalent were used in the relevant document. This approach would have avoided that sort of path by which good logic can on occasion make bad law, and would have been in accord with the aphorism that at times 'logic is only the art of going wrong with confidence'.

Having, however, examined the authorities, I feel bound in this court to say that the matter is concluded by them in that the words in brackets, as inserted at the last moment, have in law the same effect as those considered in Re Greenwood's Agreement, *Parkus v Greenwood*¹².

I may add that until towards the very end of submissions of counsel for the defendant when for the first time it emerged that there were those brackets round the relevant words, I was disposed to say—and doubt if I was alone in my disposition—that this was a case in which it would be possible not to extend the decision in that case to phraseology which might be distinguished from that in the fettering formula. However, whilst I feel the force of the submission of counsel for the plaintiffs that it is unfortunate that a case may turn to any material extent on the existence or non-existence of brackets, I yet feel unable to do other than concur in the dismissal of this appeal.

STAMP LJ. I agree, for the reasons given by Russell LJ, that it is clear from the terms of the lease that when the time came for the grant of the second five year term the new grant was to include the provisions of cl 4 (3), including the parentheses. I share the view expressed by Foster J that the case cannot be distinguished from Re Greenwood's Agreement, *Parkus v Greenwood*¹². In the absence of some statutory provision requiring or enabling the court to disregard the clear expression of the parties' intention it must follow that the lease was expressed to be perpetually renewable and so conferred on the tenant a 2,000 year term.

One of the purposes of the Law of Property Act 1922 in converting a purported perpetually renewable lease into a long term of years, was, according to the learned editors of Wolstenholme and Cherry's *Conveyancing Statutes*¹³ to discourage the creation of such leases; and to the extent that it has not done so this is a matter for the legislature.

I, too, would dismiss the appeal.

c National insurance – Contributions – Recovery – Recovery following prosecution – Payment to National Insurance and Industrial Injuries Funds – Liability of directors in event of company failing to pay – Liability of person ceasing to be director before order for payment made but after period in which contributions should have been paid – National Insurance Act 1965, ss 8 (2), 95 (8).

d On 8th October 1970 a company which had gone into liquidation on 23rd June 1970 was convicted under s 8 (2)^a of the National Insurance Act 1965 of failing to pay national insurance contributions within the time prescribed and an order was made under s 95 (3) of that Act for payment of a sum equal to the total of all the contributions under the 1965 Act and under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1965 which were proved to have been unpaid by the company in the period 1st September 1969 to 21st June 1970 and remained unpaid. The company failed to comply with that order. An action was thereupon brought under s 95 (8)^b of the National Insurance Act 1965 against the defendant who had been the managing director of the company until it went into liquidation. The defendant contended, inter alia, that s 95 (8) did not apply to him as at the time the order was made he had ceased to be a director.

e Held – A person who was a director of a company at the time when the weekly contributions ought to have been paid and were not was not exempt by reason of ceasing to be a director before an order was made against the company under s 95 (3) from the liability imposed by s 95 (8) on a director; accordingly s 95 (8) applied to the defendant (see p 257 f, p 258 h and j and p 259 a e and h, post).

Interlocutory appeal

h This was an appeal by the defendant, William Guy Alexander Wayte, from an order of Chapman J made in chambers on 17th May 1971, affirming an order of Master Bickford Smith made on 29th January 1971 that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff, the Department of Health and Social Security, for £9,216 and that the defendant's leave to defend as to the balance of the plaintiff's claim for £21,177 12s 7d from the defendant under s 95 (8) of the National Insurance Act 1965 should be conditional on payment of the £9,216 and that in default judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for the balance. The facts are set out in the judgment of Davies LJ.

DAVIES LJ. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order of Chapman J made in chambers on 17th May 1971 when the learned judge affirmed an order of Master Bickford Smith made on 29th January. The master had before him an application under RSC Ord 14 for summary judgment for the sum of £21,177 12s 7d. The master, affirmed by the judge, made an order that judgment be entered for the plaintiff for a sum of £9,216, part of the claim, and further ordered—

‘that if within 28 days that sum is so paid, the Defendant may defend the action as to the balance of the said claim . . . and that in default of payment of that sum . . . the Plaintiff may enter judgment for the balance of the claim with costs to be taxed or agreed.’

I can explain in a couple of sentences how the sum of £9,216 was reached. The total claim, as I have said, was £21,177 odd; but early in May 1970 the plaintiff had served a notice under s 223 (a) of the Companies Act 1948 on the company called Trade and Industrial Press Ltd, of which at all material times the defendant was managing director, claiming the sum of £11,961. And the £9,216 is the amount of the claim, £21,177, less the amount contained in the notice under s 223 (a) of the Companies Act 1948.

The matter arises in this way. The defendant, as I have said, was the managing director of this company, and apparently he is concerned, according to his affidavit, with many other businesses and companies. This particular company publishes a lot of magazines and so on and he, according to his affidavit, was at all times very busy indeed and also sometimes ill. From correspondence that has been exhibited to an affidavit by Mr Jenkins, who is an officer of the plaintiff department, it is plain that the company have, so far as concerns their national insurance contributions and national injuries contributions, been in arrear for a considerable time. I need not refer to the letters in detail. But we have letters of 13th November, 21st November, 23rd December 1969 and 20th February 1970, all signed by the defendant acknowledging serious arrears of contributions and making promises—and sometimes carrying them out at any rate in part—to pay off these very large sums indeed of contributions which were due by this company and had not been paid. When and to what extent they ever stuck stamps on the cards of their employees, who numbered some 130, I do not know. But things were difficult then, and the present claim for the £21,000 odd covers the period from 1st September 1969 to 21st June 1970, i.e. two days before this company went into liquidation.

The claim is framed in this way. I think I might read the particulars of claim, which are admirably clear:

‘On the 8th day October 1970, [the company], a body corporate, was convicted in the Bingham Magistrates’ Court of an offence under section 8 (2) of the National Insurance Act 1965, and in addition an order was made under section 95 (3) of the National Insurance Act 1965 for payment of the sum of £21,177 12s. 7d. (£21,177-63), being a sum equal to the total of all the contributions under the National Insurance Act 1965 and the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1965 which were proved to have been unpaid by the said body corporate in the period from the 1st day of September 1969 to the 21st day of June 1970 and which remained unpaid . . .’

In consequence of the default by the company, this action was brought against the defendant as the previous managing director of the company, under s 95 (8) of the National Insurance Act 1965. Section 8 (2) of the Act provides:

‘If any employer or insured person fails to pay at or within the time prescribed for the purpose any contribution which he is liable under this Act to pay, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding ten pounds.’

a As appears from the statement of claim endorsed on the writ, on 8th October 1970 the company were prosecuted and convicted and an order was made under s 95 (3) of the Act for the payment of that large sum of money. Then this action was brought under s 95 (8). That section provides:

b 'If the employer being a body corporate, fails to pay to the National Insurance Fund or the Industrial Injuries Fund any sum which the employer has been ordered to pay under this section, that sum, or such part thereof as remains unpaid, shall be a debt due to the National Insurance Fund or the Industrial Injuries Fund, as the case may be, jointly and severally from any directors of the body corporate who knew, or could reasonably be expected to have known, of the failure to pay the contribution or contributions in question.'

c The first point taken by counsel for the defendant is that since the company went into liquidation on 23rd June and, consequently, the defendant ceased to be managing director by that liquidation, the section has no application, since he was not a director at the time when the order was made by the court of summary jurisdiction on 8th October. And, says counsel for the defendant, that means that he is entirely exempt from liability because he was not a director at the time when the order was made against the company; therefore he cannot be said to have failed to satisfy the order made by the justices. This argument is reinforced by the proposition that of course if he had been a director at the material time then he could have used his powers as such to cause the company to comply with the justices' order but that, as he was not such a director at the material time and as the affairs of the company were in the hands of the liquidator, he had no such power; and it is suggested, possibly correctly, that he would have no right of recourse against the company. Whether he had such a right or not does not matter very much, as the company, according to the figures that have been put before us, is in a very parlous financial plight.

e I find it impossible to accept that contention. It is perfectly true that the justices' order crystallises and, as it were, quantifies the amount of the unpaid contributions. But the contributions were payable from time to time—weekly. And it seems to me, subject to the second point of counsel for the defendant, that it is perfectly plain f that the order made by the justices coupled with the provisions of s 95 (8), imposes a liability to satisfy the order on anyone who was a director at the time when the contributions ought to have been paid and were not, even though he had ceased to be a director by the time that the justices' order was made.

g I thought that counsel for the plaintiff made an extremely good point, if I may respectfully say so, in his first observation in his address to this court. He pointed out that if the contention of counsel for the defendant is correct, never mind the liquidation, if a man who was a director or managing director of a company was aware that proceedings were pending under the section, a prosecution against the company, as he would be aware when the company had received the summons, he could escape and evade any liability under the section by resigning from his directorship on the very morning of the day appointed for the hearing before the justices. h That cannot, in my judgment, be correct, and I think that that is one excellent point in addition to the considerations I have thought fit to advance.

The second point is again on the words of the section. This is a question of fact. Counsel for the defendant says that in the circumstances it is clear—or at any rate it is arguable, perhaps that is a fairer way of putting it—that the defendant during the period from September 1969 to June 1970 did not know and could not reasonably be expected to have known of the failure to pay the contributions in question. As I say, j that is a question of fact.

There is a good deal of controversy on this issue. The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff consisted of an affidavit by Mr Jenkins, an officer of the department. I am not going to read that; but Mr Jenkins states that on a number of occasions, going back to January 1967, the defendant was interviewed, and a Miss Lewis, who was the company's secretary, was interviewed. With regard to Miss Lewis he says that on one occasion she said that she had repeatedly asked the defendant for money to purchase stamps but she did not get the money. He says that in August 1967 the secretary stated, 'there was no shortage of money as far as she was aware but the defendant simply would not meet the requests for payment'. On another occasion the secretary said that she 'had been unable to obtain the necessary money from the defendant to purchase the stamps'. And when told the amount the defendant said, 'Is it as much as that?'. There is no doubt at all that over the years the defendant himself had been not only, as I have said, corresponding with the department but had had various interviews with the department as to this continued failure punctually to pay the appropriate contributions under the Act. a

Miss Lewis has sworn an affidavit in which she denies those three interviews referred to in Mr Jenkins's affidavit to which I have alluded; and a Mr Campbell, who was apparently manager of the appropriate office in the company, has sworn an affidavit saying that really the defendant had very little to do with this, that in effect it was the responsibility of himself and Miss Lewis to see that the stamps were properly stuck on and that the contributions were made. Indeed they go further and they say that they were given blank cheques by the defendant—I suppose company's cheques—and given strict instructions, at any rate from January 1970, that the contributions should be punctually paid. b

That was the state of the evidence as it was before Chapman J. But we have had another affidavit from the defendant today, to which he exhibits a letter from this Mr Campbell. It is to be observed that Mr Campbell has not condescended to swear an affidavit to support that letter. It was a letter written to Messrs Rubinstein, Nash & Co, who are acting for the defendant. Without reading it in detail, what Mr Campbell says is that monthly accounts were supplied to the defendant by him and Miss Lewis, that in those monthly accounts there appeared an item each month for the cost of stamps, and that from January on, those accounts showed an entry (I take, for example, the penultimate one that we have had, for March 1970) 'Total stamps £1,012. 1s. 3d.', and that is added to the wages for March, showing a total paid of £16,000. What Mr Campbell says in his letter to the solicitors is that, despite the orders that he and Miss Lewis had received to buy stamps and keep the payments up to date, they made those false entries in the return which they gave monthly to the defendant and that they had not in fact paid any money for stamps at all but found that they could more usefully use the money which they were drawing on these cheques to pay wages, general outgoings, and the general expenses of running the company. c

I do not think it would be right for me to express an opinion as to the conduct of Mr Campbell and Miss Lewis in this regard or to say whether I believe that story or not. If the defendant is able to make the payment into court and, consequently, able to defend the rest of the claim, no doubt that may be a matter to be carefully investigated. But what I do say, and what I am absolutely satisfied about on the facts of this case, is that from the past history, the constant arrears in payment of stamps, the interviews, and the correspondence that he had had with the Ministry, it seems to me perfectly plain that during the period in question the defendant could reasonably be expected to have known that the contributions were not being properly and regularly paid. d

I am sorry to say I cannot accept the submission of counsel for the defendant that on this second point, the point of fact, there is a triable issue. I think that the learned judge—whose judgment we have not seen, whatever reasons he may have given—was perfectly right in the conclusion to which he came, and I would dismiss the appeal. e

KARMINSKI LJ. I agree, and I desire to express my explicit agreement with what has fallen from Davies LJ on his construction of s 95 (8) of the National Insurance f a Act 1965. On the facts I entertain no doubt that the defendant here has failed completely so far as I am concerned to show a possible defence or a triable issue. Davies LJ has dealt with the surprising admissions now made by Mr Campbell in two letters and I desire to make no comment on the present state of the evidence other than to say that as at present advised I find it very difficult indeed to accept it.

b The defendant was the managing director of this company and although no doubt, as he says, he had many duties elsewhere, including certain editorial duties away from the head office of the company in Nottinghamshire, he must have been in touch with the company's financial affairs. He now says, it seems to me for the first time, that he thought that the stamps were being paid, and paid at the rate of something like £1,500 a month on the average. He now says that, trusting his subordinates, he believed them and now realises that he was being grossly deceived. I assume that the accounts were audited and the usual returns made. The auditors, no doubt c examining the books and checking payments, whether by cash or by cheques, were investigating these matters and presumably the defendant saw the returns and saw the auditors' reports. I repeat that I do not think there is a triable issue in this case, and I think that the learned judge was absolutely right in making the order which he did.

d ROSKILL LJ. This appeal can only succeed if the defendant can show one or more triable issues. Counsel for the defendant has sought to show that there are two triable issues, the first on the construction of s 95 (8) of the National Insurance Act 1965, and the second on the facts of the case as alleged to be contained in various affidavits and a letter (which was put before us but which was not before the learned e judge), dated 30th June 1971, from Mr Campbell.

f As to the first point I have nothing to add to what Davies LJ has said. As to the second, counsel for the defendant sought to persuade us that the existence of this subsection was very little known. Whether or not that is so I do not know. But the subsection provides quite plainly that in the circumstances, if the Department of Health and Social Security cannot get the money due to it from a company in respect of stamps which ought to have been bought but which have not been bought, they can pursue the directors for it if the director or directors concerned knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the failure to pay the contribution or contributions in question.

g As this action may still go to trial if the payment ordered to be made into court by the learned judge is made, perhaps the less that is said about the facts the better. All that I would say is this. The defendant was the managing director of the company. The company had no finance director. The evidence relating to the antecedent period showed that he was closely involved in a dispute with the department over repeated non-payment of contributions, and it seems to me that, whether or not he knew what was happening during the relevant period, it is quite unarguable that he could not reasonably be expected to have known. For that reason, on the second h point I do not think there is a triable issue.

I think that the learned judge was absolutely right and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Nuisance – Statutory nuisance – Abatement notice – Failure to comply – Complaint to justices – Procedure – Initiation of proceedings – Information laid by local authority – Jurisdiction of justices – Whether failure to comply with abatement notice an ‘offence’ – Whether laying of information proper method of initiating proceedings – Public Health Act 1936, s 94 (1), (2) – Magistrates’ Courts Act 1952, s 42.

Nuisance – Statutory nuisance – Appeal to quarter sessions – Nuisance order made by justices on failure to comply with abatement notice – Appeal a rehearing – Circumstances relating to the offence at date of ‘hearing of the complaint’ – Whether circumstances at date of hearing before justices or at date of hearing of appeal to be considered – Public Health Act 1936, s 94 (2).

A notice of abatement under the Public Health Act 1936 and the Noise Abatement Act 1960 was served on the appellants requiring them to abate a nuisance by noise emanating from their premises. The appellants failed to comply with the notice and an information was laid on behalf of the respondent authority before the justices who made a nuisance order under s 94 (2)^a of the 1936 Act. The appellants appealed to quarter sessions contending that the justices had no jurisdiction to make the nuisance order, and a fortiori quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to hear the case, as the proceedings had been initiated by information and not, as provided by s 94 (1)^b of the 1936 Act, by complaint. The appellants further contended that, if quarter sessions had jurisdiction to rehear the case, they were bound to look at the circumstances relating to the alleged offence as they existed not at the date of the hearing before the justices (which was several months earlier) but at the date of the appeal on the ground that the hearing of the appeal was, within the meaning of s 94 (2), a ‘hearing of the complaint’.

Held – (i) Both the justices and quarter sessions had jurisdiction to hear the information; on the true construction of s 94 non-compliance with a notice of abatement was an ‘offence’, and so, notwithstanding the use of the word ‘complaint’ in that section, by virtue of s 42^c of the Magistrates’ Courts Act 1952 the proper way of initiating proceedings was by way of information (see p 263 f and g, p 264 c, p 265 h and p 266 d and e, post).

(ii) On considering an appeal against the making of a nuisance order quarter sessions had to rehear the case as in the same state of affairs as that in which the justices below had heard it; accordingly the relevant date for considering the circumstances of the alleged offence was the date of the original hearing (see p 265 f g and h and p 266 d, post).

R v County of London Quarter Sessions Appeals Committee Justices [1946] KB 176.

Case stated

- c* This was an appeal by Northern Ireland Trailers Ltd by way of case stated by the Lancashire County Quarter Sessions in respect of certain decisions made by them sitting at Preston.

On 26th August 1970 an information was laid on behalf of the respondents, Preston Corpn, before the Preston borough magistrates stating that on 6th February 1970 a notice under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1936 and the Noise Abatement Act 1960 dated 5th February 1970 requiring the abatement of a certain statutory nuisance arising from excessive noise emanating from the appellants' premises was duly served on the appellants, the occupiers thereof, and that the appellants had made default in complying with the requirement of the notice, i.e. within 21 days of the service of the same to abate the nuisance and to take such steps as might be necessary for that purpose. A summons was issued on 7th September 1970. The

- e* information was heard by the Preston borough magistrates on 9th and 23rd November 1970 and on the latter date they adjudged that the complaint was true (sic) and made a nuisance order under s 94 (2) of the Public Health Act 1936. The appellants by notice of appeal dated 1st December 1970 gave notice of appeal against the order. The appeal came on for hearing before quarter sessions on 6th April 1971 and at the outset a preliminary point was taken on behalf of the appellants that inasmuch as those proceedings were commenced by information when as a matter of law they could only be begun by complaint the magistrates' court had had no jurisdiction to make the nuisance order appealed against and that a fortiori quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to hear the matter. Quarter sessions were of opinion that the appellants' contentions on the preliminary point were ill-founded.
- f*

- The appeal proceeded expressly without prejudice to the appellants' aforesaid contentions on 7th and 8th April 1971. It became apparent in the course of the evidence that the appellants were seeking to rely on the state of affairs existing at that time and not at the time of the hearing before the justices; on enquiry it was agreed on behalf of the appellants that this was indeed so. It was contended by the appellants that a prerequisite for the making of a nuisance order under s 94 (2) of the Public Health Act 1936 was that it should be proved that 'upon the hearing of the complaint the alleged nuisance exists' and that albeit this appeal was a rehearing it was nonetheless a 'hearing of the complaint' so that the relevant date for this purpose and also for the purpose of the statutory defence under s 1 (3) of the Noise Abatement Act 1960 was the date of hearing of this appeal. Quarter sessions were of opinion that the appellants' contentions on that point were ill-founded.
- h*

- At that stage the appellants sought and were granted an adjournment so that they might consider and if thought fit seek a review of the two judgments of quarter sessions referred to above. On 16th April 1971, at the appellants' request, a case was stated for the opinion of the High Court as it appeared that much time and money might be saved if these matters were determined.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from the Lancashire County Quarter Sessions in respect of two decisions which have been described, not inaptly, as interlocutory proceedings, reached by them when sitting at Preston on 6th-8th April 1971. a

The situation which presented itself to the quarter sessions on 6th April was this. On 26th August 1970 an information, and I stress the word 'information', was laid on behalf of the respondents, Preston Corpn, before the Preston borough magistrates alleging— b

'that on the 6th February, 1970 a notice under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1936 and the Noise Abatement Act 1960 dated the 5th February 1970 requiring the abatement of a certain statutory nuisance arising from excessive noise emanating from the Appellants' premises namely the compound situate on the Preston Dock Estate on the southern perimeter of Riversway in the said Borough was duly served on the Appellants the Occupier thereof and that the Appellants made default in complying with the requirement of the said notice namely within 21 days of the service of the same to abate the said nuisance and to take such steps as might be necessary for that purpose.' c

A summons consequent on the information was issued on 7th September 1970. d

I think it is not unhelpful to look at the legislation and see the circumstances in which the notice was served. Section 94 (1) of the Public Health Act 1936 provides:

'If the person on whom an abatement notice has been served [there having been prior provision for the service of such a notice] makes default in complying with any of the requirements of the notice, or if the nuisance, although abated since the service of the notice, is, in the opinion of the local authority, likely to recur on the same premises, the authority shall cause a complaint to be made to the justice of the peace, and the justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person on whom the notice was served to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction.' e

That is exactly what happened in this case, save only for the fact that the nuisance alleged was a noise nuisance, and the authority for using what one might call s 94 procedure in respect of a noise nuisance is to be found in the Noise Abatement Act 1960. f

I will read s 94 (2) of the 1936 Act before proceeding further with the case:

'If on the hearing of the complaint [and I stress again the word "complaint"] it is proved that the alleged nuisance exists, or that although abated it is likely to recur on the same premises, then, subject to the provisions of subsections (4) and (5) of this section the court shall make an order (hereafter in this Act referred to as "a nuisance order") for either, or both, of the following purposes . . . ' g

Then the purposes are set out, one being to require the defendant to comply with the notice, the other being to prohibit a recurrence of the nuisance; then are added these words, 'and may also impose on the defendant a fine not exceeding five pounds', a phrase which again is of some relevance in this matter. h

When the matter came before the Preston borough magistrates on 9th November 1970, and later on 23rd November, the justices adjudged that the information was correct; they found in other words the existence of the nuisance, they found the service of the notice and failure to comply with the notice, and they accordingly made a nuisance order under s 94 (2). They could have imposed a fine of up to £5: they did not impose a fine of any amount. i

The matter was then appealed to quarter sessions, and as I have already said the case came on before sessions on 6th April 1971. Two points were taken. The first point taken by the appellants was one going to jurisdiction. It was contended that a whereas s 94 contemplates that proceedings of this kind shall be initiated by complaint, in fact the initiation of the proceedings was by information. It is clear as a fact that that is so, and that an information was used and not a complaint as required by the literal terms of s 94.

b It was then contended that that was a fundamental defect in the jurisdiction, that the magistrates had no jurisdiction to make the nuisance order which they had purported to make and, although logically the proper remedy may well have been an application to this court for certiorari to quash the order, it was agreed between the parties that if the quarter sessions upheld the contention, a convenient course would be to allow the appeal. The quarter sessions did not uphold the contention, and we have had the advantage of reading a very careful, and if I may say so very helpful, judgment delivered by the chairman. I have had great assistance in reaching a conclusion on this case by considering the chairman's judgment, but I do not propose to try and traverse all the ground which he covered.

c Briefly in my view this preliminary point should be disposed of as follows. It is perfectly true that the word 'complaint' is used in s 94 to describe the nature of the proceedings on which this application is to be based, and, as was pointed out in argument, at the time when this Act was passed there was a measure of confusion in various statutory provisions of this kind, between the use of 'information' and the use of 'complaint' respectively as the initiating course. In 1952 when the Magistrates' Courts Act of that year was passed, this distinction was made very much clearer, because it is quite clear under the 1952 Act that, in general, criminal matters are initiated by information and civil matters by way of complaint; but that distinction was not as clearly made in the Acts passed before that year. One finds in s 42 of the Act of 1952 this provision:

e 'In any enactment conferring power on a magistrates' court to deal with an offence, or to issue a summons or warrant against a person suspected of an offence, on the complaint of any person, for references to a complaint there shall be substituted references to an information.'

f In my judgment there really can be no doubt but that the effect of that section is to say that an information should be used in preference to or in substitution for a complaint notwithstanding that the earlier statute uses the word 'complaint', provided of course that the matter being dealt with is an offence.

g Argument on this preliminary point thus really turns on whether the failure to comply with the nuisance notice under s 94 gave rise to an offence which was to be enforced by the local authority. If it was an offence, then notwithstanding that a complaint is described in s 94 as the correct initiating procedure, it would in my judgment mean that an information was proper by virtue of s 42 of the Act of 1952. In deciding whether or not that which was done by the appellants is an offence for the present purposes, I think considerable importance should be attached to the fact that a fine is a possible consequence of failure to comply with the abatement notice. h The word 'fine' is characteristic of a penalty for a criminal act, and the fact that Parliament used the word 'fine' to describe the penalty which can be imposed in these circumstances is in my judgment a powerful indication that that which is committed as a result of failure to comply with the notice is an offence for the present purposes.

i But I am much reinforced in that view by the judgment of Lord Goddard CJ in *Brown v Allweather Mechanical Grouting Co Ltd*¹. That dealt with an infringement of the Vehicles (Excise) Act 1949, the infringement being the showing of one particular type of licence on a vehicle when the vehicle was of a character which required a different type of licence. The point raised in this case was whether a breach of the licensing regulation carried out in that way was a criminal offence which would make the owner of a vehicle liable to prosecution as an aider and abetter of the driver. The facts thus were considerably distant from those of the present case, but there is a statement of principle which I would adopt. Lord Goddard CJ there said²:

'I do not think the mere fact that the word "offence" is used there shows that it is to be regarded as a criminal offence. A failure to do something prescribed by a statute may be described as an offence although Parliament imposes in respect of it, not a criminal sanction, but a mere pecuniary sanction which is recoverable as a civil debt.'

I would apply that reasoning to the construction of s 42 of the Act of 1952, and would hold that the word 'offence' in that section is appropriately used for a failure to do something prescribed by an Act. Accordingly, whether or not it is in fact a criminal offence, in my judgment the failure to comply with the notice is an offence for present purposes, and that is really an end of the matter as far as the preliminary point is concerned.

I ought, however, in deference to the argument of counsel for the appellants to refer to another provision from which he draws considerable force in the course of his argument. It is the Public Health (Recurring Nuisances) Act 1969. This Act, which has to be read as one with Part III of the Public Health Act 1936, introduces an additional form of remedy available in the course of recurring public health nuisances. It introduces a new form of remedy in the form of a prohibition notice which, on disregard of its contents, gives rise to the hearing of a complaint under s 2 of the Act. Counsel for the appellants argues that the fact that Parliament as late as 1969 is referring to a complaint as being the appropriate method of initiation of what one might call 'public health nuisance cases' is indicative of the fact either that s 42 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 should not have the effect which I have already said in my opinion it has; or alternatively should be regarded as having been to that extent repealed. His contention is that Parliament would not have used the word 'complaint' in an Act of 1969 if it had known that by virtue of the earlier legislation, 'complaint' was to be read as 'information'.

I find very little support for counsel for the appellants' argument in this aspect of the matter because it seems to me entirely logical and normal drafting that when a new Act is to be read as one with an earlier, it should use the same language as the earlier, in other words, should use words in the same sense as they were used in the earlier. It is as though the provisions of the 1969 Act had appeared as part of the 1936 Act.

Against counsel's argument on this point, on the other hand, I find some considerable reinforcement in the terms of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, which by s 92 makes certain upward adjustments in fines for a wide range of offences. Those offences are illustrated in Sch 3 to the Act of 1967, and one finds amongst the offences so listed, failure to abate or remove a danger or recurring nuisance under s 94 of the Public Health Act 1936. One there finds Parliament in 1967 regarding a failure to comply with an abatement notice under s 94 as an offence. Accordingly in my judgment the sessions were entirely right to reject the preliminary point and to proceed with the hearing of the appeal.

The second point, which is quite independent of the first, arises in this way: there had, as I had already indicated, been a substantial interval of time between the date when the justices made the nuisance order on 23rd November 1970, and the date when quarter sessions considered the appeal on 6th April 1971. It was not disputed below or before us that when the matter was before the magistrates' court it was essential for the respondents to show that the alleged nuisance still existed at that time. The phrase in s 94 (2) is: 'If on the hearing of the complaint it is proved that a the alleged nuisance exists', and accordingly when the matter was before the magistrates' court, proof was directed to the existence of the nuisance at that date. However, when the matter was opened before quarter sessions it became apparent at an early stage that counsel for the appellants was proposing to relate his argument on the appeal to the situation then prevailing in April 1971. The learned chairman was invited to give a ruling whether that was the correct approach to this case, and he ruled that it was not; in other words he ruled that on the hearing of the appeal the issue for quarter sessions was whether or not the nuisance had existed on 23rd November 1970, the date when the matter was before the magistrates' court. Counsel challenges that conclusion, and says that the fact that the proceedings at quarter sessions are a rehearing means, in the context of s 94, that one looks to the circumstances prevailing at the date of the rehearing in order to see whether the nuisance exists for present purposes.

c For my part I think that the ruling of the chairman to the effect that the relevant date was the date of the hearing before the justices is entirely correct, and is fully supported by another judgment of Lord Goddard CJ in *Rugman v Drover*³. This was a case in which a girl had been sent to an approved school at a time when she was under 17 years of age; there was an appeal and at the date of the appeal she was over 17 years of age. It became relevant, therefore, to consider whether the date on which the decision of the court turned was the earlier date or the later. Lord Goddard CJ, having referred to the quarter sessions' acceptance of the proposition that the later date was relevant, said⁴:

e 'That seems to me to be completely wrong. An appeal to quarter sessions is an appeal by way of re-hearing, but that is only a procedural matter, there being no formal record of proceedings in a justices' court. When a case goes to quarter sessions it is re-heard and the person seeking an order must prove the case over again. That means that the appeal committee takes the place of the petty sessions, but it is none the less an appeal, and the order appealed from was properly made so far as jurisdiction was concerned at the time it was made. Quarter sessions have to re-hear the case as in the same state of affairs as those in which the justices below heard it. If the matter could be made any clearer, it seems to me it is only necessary to look at the Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act, 1933.'

f Then Lord Goddard CJ set out the terms of that section.

g I consider that that is a statement of general application, that when appeals are brought to quarter sessions under the general appellate machinery, the quarter sessions have to consider the appeal in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time when the order appealed from was made. I think that, as I have already indicated, the chairman's view on this second point was the right one, and I would simply dismiss this appeal.

h ASHWORTH J. I agree. I would only add on the first point that it seems to me that the use of the word 'fine' in s 94 (2) of the Public Health Act 1936 goes a long way to establishing the proposition relied on by the respondents here. This is not the first time that this subject has come before the courts, although in the earlier cases it was the Public Health Act 1875. I note from *R v Whitchurch*⁵, which counsel for the appellants referred to, that there was provision in that case for the imposition of a fine, although in fact none was imposed. In the course of the argument counsel for the justices, who were seeking to support the decision below argued⁶:

3 [1950] 2 All ER 575, [1951] 1 KB 380

5 (1881) 7 QBD 534

6 (1881) 7 QBD at 535

'It is true that they might have fined the defendant; but they have adopted the alternative remedy and have simply ordered him to abate the nuisance. a

'BRETT, L.J. Suppose that a fine had been imposed by the justices; could this case have been distinguished from Mellor v. Denham?' b

That was an earlier authority to which we have been referred and there was no answer. Accordingly it was there made quite plain that in respect of a nuisance order under the Public Health Act 1875 the wrongdoing which led to the order could properly be regarded as an offence and a criminal matter so long as there was a possibility of imposing a fine. But to complete the matter, in the same case to which Lord Widgery C.J. has referred, I cite from Lord Goddard C.J.'s judgment from *Brown v Allweather Mechanical Grouting Co Ltd*⁸ where he said:

'It is true that, if the word "penalty", as distinct from the word "fine", is used in a section, the general rule is that the penalty must be sought and recovered as a debt in a civil court, whereas a fine is a penalty imposed by a criminal court, and a fine always goes to the Crown.' c

I have no doubt that the preliminary point taken by counsel for the appellants was rightly rejected and I agree with the result proposed by Lord Widgery C.J. d

BRIDGE J. I agree on both points. On the second point I wish to add nothing. On the first point I am persuaded by the same considerations as have been referred to by Ashworth J that an offence in contravention of s 94 (2) of the Public Health Act 1936 is indeed a criminal offence. For my part I think that s 42 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 applies only to criminal offences. The Act of 1952 makes a clear distinction between criminal jurisdiction and procedure on the one hand, and civil jurisdiction and procedure on the other, treating of the first in Part I of the Act and the second in Part II. The criminal jurisdiction of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 is invoked by information, as s 1 makes clear at the beginning of Part I; the civil jurisdiction is invoked by complaint as s 43 makes clear at the beginning of Part II. Section 42 of the Act is found at the conclusion of Part I, and when the section provides that in any enactment conferring power on a magistrates' court to deal with an offence on the complaint of any person, for references to a 'complaint' there shall be substituted references to an 'information', I cannot avoid the conclusion that the section is dealing only with criminal offences. e

Jaglom v Excess Insurance Co Ltd and another

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

DONALDSON J

10th, 11th, 26th MAY 1971

Insurance – All risks – Policy covering property whilst in bank – Extension of cover given for period when property not in bank subject to prior advice to broker of intention to remove from bank custody — Policy covering jewellery – Broker knowing jewellery not in bank at inception of policy – Loss of jewellery – Underwriters' liability – Whether necessary for jewellery first to be placed in bank before underwriters on risk – Whether prior advice deemed to have been given to broker.

Insurance – Broker's slip – Underwriters' liability – Effect of amendments made to slip by subsequent underwriters – Basis on which underwriters agreeing to take a line.

The plaintiff's husband, J, wished to renew the all risks insurance cover on his wife's jewellery, which expired on 24th April 1968. He was informed by his broker that he could only obtain cover for the jewellery at a premium of 50s per cent. J agreed to the renewal of the cover on those terms but asked his broker to see if he could obtain improved terms. The broker saw J on 4th June and suggested that an overall saving in premium might be effected if the jewellery, which to his knowledge was not in the bank, was kept there and only taken out when required for use; whilst the jewellery was in the bank only a nominal premium would be payable; a premium in excess of 50s per cent per annum would however be required for the period when the jewellery was out of the bank. J instructed the broker to make further enquiries along those lines. The broker prepared a slip for the insurance of the plaintiff's jewellery against all risks 'whilst in the assured's bank' at a premium of 3s 6d per cent. The slip further provided for the extension of cover for items 'taken out of the Bank' at a much higher premium. A line was accepted by the leading underwriters, the first defendants, on 10th June. While the slip was going round the market and lines were being written by various other underwriters (the last accepting a line on 9th July), certain amendments were made to the slip. In particular the extension of cover for items taken out of the bank was amended by the qualifying words 'sub prior advice to [broker] only'. On 10th July J was informed by the broker that the all risks cover for his wife's jewellery had been rearranged retrospectively as from 4th June and that the jewellery was covered at 3s 6d per cent per annum whilst in the bank but at a much higher rate 'in respect of items taken out of the bank subject to immediate notice of removal being given to [the broker]'. On that same day a piece of jewellery valued at £11,250 was stolen from the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed against the first defendants an indemnity under the slip, and in the alternative against the second defendant, the broker, £11,250 damages for failure to obtain adequate cover. The issues arose (i) whether the first defendants were bound by the terms of the slip as subsequently varied by succeeding underwriters, (ii) whether, under the terms of the slip, before the first defendants came on risk the jewellery had first to be placed in the bank, and (iii) whether, if the words 'taken out of the bank' meant 'being out of the bank', prior notice had been given to the broker.

Held – (i) An underwriter who agreed to take a line was making and not accepting an offer on the terms of the slip at the time when he saw it, but he retained the right to modify that offer to accord with different terms inserted by underwriters taking subsequent lines; once the slip had been fully subscribed however it constituted a contract and all the underwriters were deemed to have offered to accept the risk for their respective proportions on the terms of the slip in the finally amended form, whether or not they knew of subsequent amendments. Thus the first defendants had agreed to provide cover in the terms of the slip in its amended form (see p 271 e to g and p 272 b and c, post). a

Thompson v Adams (1889) 23 QBD 361 and Grover & Grover Ltd v Mathews [1910] 2 KB 401 considered.

(ii) It was not a requirement of the cover that the jewellery had first to be delivered into the custody of the bank before it could be said to have been 'taken out of the Bank' (see p 273 h, post). b

(iii) The requirement that prior advice had to be given to the broker was satisfied if the broker knew that the insured property was leaving or at the inception of the policy, as in the present case, was outside the custody of the bank (see p 274 c and d, post). c

(iv) It followed that the first defendants were, in the circumstances, liable for the loss (see p 274 g, post).

Action

This was an action by the plaintiff, Judith Jaglom, against the first defendants, the Excess Insurance Co Ltd ('Excess'), claiming an indemnity under a Lloyd's insurance policy in respect of the insurance of certain jewellery valued at £11,250, and in the alternative against the second defendant, Oliver Brian Gilbert-Smith, trading as Geo H Fryer & Co, a firm ('the brokers') claiming £11,250 damages for breach of his contractual duty towards her on the ground that he had failed to arrange adequate insurance cover for her from the first defendants. The facts are set out in the judgment. f

26th May. DONALDSON J read the following judgment. Mr and Mrs Jaglom live in a part of Hampstead which in 1968 was as attractive to burglars as it was to the residents. Indeed, they themselves had suffered a burglary in the previous year. When, therefore, Mr Jaglom came to renew their domestic insurances in March/April 1968, the second defendant, his broker, wrote gloomily that he expected underwriters to require a new rate of premium on all risks cover in the region of 35s to 40s per cent. This compared very unfavourably with the old rate of 25s per cent. When the broker made more detailed enquiries, he found that the situation was even worse than he had thought, for many of the underwriters refused to renew on any terms and others were only prepared to write a smaller line. By 18th April he had been able to obtain agreement to cover the whole of the Jagloms' all risks h a insurance on £38,000 worth of jewellery, furs and personal effects, but only at a premium of 50s per cent. As this premium amounts to not much short of £1,000 per annum, Mr Jaglom was somewhat less than delighted. However, the existing policy was due to expire on 24th April and obviously he could not afford to be uninsured. It was, therefore, agreed that an insurance should be effected on these terms and that during the next few weeks, whilst Mr and Mrs Jaglom were abroad, the broker should see what could be done to obtain improved terms. The Excess b Insurance Co Ltd ('Excess') wrote 15 per cent of the risk under this policy.

On Mr Jaglom's return, he asked Mr Dunkley of the brokers to call on him in order to discuss ways and means of reducing this premium. This meeting took place on 4th June 1968. Mr Dunkley's suggestion was that the jewellery should be deposited with Mr Jaglom's bank and only taken out when it was required for use. The premium
c applicable whilst the jewellery was in the bank would be little more than nominal and whilst it would be more than 50s per cent per annum in respect of any period when it was out of the bank, there should be an overall saving. Mr Jaglom asked how this would work in practice and explained that some items, for example his gold watch, could not be kept in the bank. He wanted to know what would happen when he and his wife went to the theatre and his wife needed some of the jewellery.
d Mr Dunkley replied that there would be no problem. Mr Jaglom would simply get the jewellery from the bank when it was needed and once a month the brokers would make a declaration to underwriters of what jewellery had been withdrawn from the bank and for how long. This declaration procedure was familiar to Mr Jaglom who had for years operated it in conjunction with the brokers in respect of goods pledged to the merchant bank with which he was associated. Accordingly, e he thought that this might well be a practical solution, provided that it would produce a worthwhile saving in premium. Mr Dunkley said that he would have to make further enquiries and would in due course report back to Mr Jaglom who could then decide whether to maintain the 50s per cent policy or to change to a policy on the lines suggested.

At no time during the interview did Mr Dunkley ask where the jewellery was
f at that moment and at no time did Mr Jaglom tell him. However, Mr Dunkley rightly appreciated that it was not in the bank, for a possible change to keeping it in the bank was the whole basis of the discussion. In fact the watch was being worn by Mr Jaglom and the remainder was either being worn by Mrs Jaglom or was in the wall safe at the Jaglom's house.

Nothing further occurred so far as the Jagloms were concerned until 10th July 1968. On the morning of that day Mr Jaglom received by hand a letter from Mr g Dunkley saying that the all risks insurance had been rearranged as from 4th June 1968. Under this new arrangement the jewellery was covered whilst in the bank at a premium of 3s 6d per cent per annum, but this cover was extended at much higher rates 'in respect of items taken out of the Bank subject to immediate notice of removal being given to Geo. H. Fryer & Company' (the name under which the h brokers carried on business). The letter continued:

'Unfortunately Underwriters are not prepared to accept this part of the policy on a Monthly Declaration basis . . . I trust that these arrangements are satisfactory to you, and if you have any points which you wish to raise please do not hesitate to contact me. Unless I hear from you to the contrary I shall issue our Debit Notes on this basis in a few days time.'

j It seems to me that on a fair reading of this letter Mr Jaglom was being told that the insurance had been rearranged retrospectively, but that it was still open to him to object or to suggest some different arrangement. Nothing else can explain the last sentence of the letter and in any event the brokers had no authority to bind him to such a rearrangement in the light of the fact that Mr Dunkley had promised to report back to enable Mr Jaglom to reach a decision, but had not done so.

Simultaneously in another part of London Mrs Jaglom was on her way to a jewellers in order to have a diamond drop repaired. It must have been a very fine piece for it was worth £11,500. She carried it in her handbag. There is no suggestion that anyone knew that she would visit the jewellers or when she would do so, but no sooner had she arrived and put her handbag on the counter than three men burst in and snatched the handbag. At about the same time these men committed similar crimes in other parts of London. Mrs Jaglom at once telephoned her husband, who informed the brokers.

When Mrs Jaglom left her home that morning carrying the jewel, both she and her husband had every reason to believe that it was insured against all risks. If it was not, it was the fault of the brokers. In such circumstances, it would have been more in accord with the deservedly high reputation of the London insurance market that Mr and Mrs Jaglom should have been paid promptly, without prejudice to whether the ultimate liability was that of underwriters under the 50s policy, of underwriters under the new policy or of the brokers and their underwriters. It is most regrettable that this did not happen and that the Jagloms were left to decide for themselves who was liable. Ultimately Mrs Jaglom sued Excess as the leading underwriter under the new policy with an alternative claim against the brokers. Excess, if liable at all, were only on risk to the extent of 19.7 per cent of the loss, but, to their credit, they did not wish Mrs Jaglom to be involved in suing all the Lloyd's syndicates and the companies concerned and agreed that, if they were liable for their proportion, they would pay 100 per cent and recover from their co-insurers. This attitude has, I regret to say, not received its just reward for one of the co-insurers was the Vehicle and General, who have gone out of business since Excess agreed to accept full liability, but Excess have not, of course, sought to resile from their agreement.

Less meritorious has been the attitude of the brokers. It was for them and their underwriters to see that the Jagloms were paid at once and to make what recovery they could in the name of the Jagloms. This they did not do. Even when the action came on for trial and they were asked how the Jagloms could possibly fail against both defendants, their admission of liability, contingent on Excess not being liable, was qualified by a proviso that Mrs Jaglom should not have failed against Excess solely because her advisers had failed to plead the right point. This was quite reasonable in itself, but it left Mrs Jaglom with a risk of being paid by no one, which she should not have been expected to bear. In the circumstances I had no hesitation in allowing extensive reamendments to the points of claim, without close enquiry whether they were necessary, so that the only real issue—that between Excess and the brokers—could be tried on its merits.

No policy has ever been issued and the only contractual document is the brokers' slip. As originally prepared by the brokers it read:

'All Risks—"R" Form—12 months. Noon 24th April, 1968. £35,591.5s.od., on Jewellery, as per specification, against All Risks whilst in the Assured's Bank situated, [and then there is a blank]. Excess £50 each and every loss. Premium 3s. 6d. per cent—20 per cent [which is in fact a reference to commission] a/c Mrs. J. Jaglom, [and it gave her home address].

'It is agreed to extend this policy in respect of items taken out of the Bank in accordance with the rates on the attached schedule. It is further agreed that Underwriters accept Monthly Declarations in respect of items out of the Bank to be agreed by the leading Underwriter only.'

This slip went the rounds of the companies and of Lloyd's underwriters and, over a period of about a month, lines were written which eventually totalled 101.5 per cent, as a result of which all lines were subsequently scaled down pro rata to produce 100 per cent. One underwriter initialled his line on 15th July 1968, five days after the loss had occurred, but I fully accept the explanation that this line had been promised a at an earlier point of time and that the initialling was merely confirmation of an existing commitment. Excess, who were the leading underwriters, accepted a line of 20 per cent on 10th June 1968. Two companies and a Lloyd's syndicate accepted lines on 9th July, and others accepted parts of the risk on various dates in between. During this process the slip was amended, but by whom and when and by what stages is wrapped in mystery. Suffice it to say that the commencement date was changed from 24th April 1968 to 'to b.s.l/u.' (which being interpreted means 'to be agreed with leading underwriter') and then further changed to 4th June 1968. The blank after 'in the Assured's Bank situated' was completed by the addition of 't.b.a l/u.' and the scheduled rates for jewellery taken out of the bank were also qualified by the words 'or t.b.a.l/u.' Last, and by far the most important, the extension of cover for items taken out of the bank was qualified by the words, 'Sub prior advice to L/UW only' which in turn was amended to read 'Sub prior advice to G H Fryer only'.

b These amendments led at the hearing to some discussion on whether individual underwriters might not have become bound on different terms, the basis of this suggestion being that a slip is an offer which is accepted by the underwriter taking a line. It would follow that each underwriter was bound on the terms of the slip as at the moment when he accepted his line and could not, without the consent of the broker on behalf of the assured, vary the terms of his contract to accord with different terms insisted on by subsequent underwriters. It would also follow that if, for example, only Excess had been prepared to write the risk and that only for 20 per cent the assured could be compelled to accept a policy for only this percentage, despite the fact that in the absence of 100 per cent cover, he might well wish to make quite different arrangements.

c These absurd consequences leave me in no doubt that the underlying legal analysis is fallacious. The true analysis is that each underwriter who agrees to take a line is making and not accepting an offer. That offer is on the terms of the slip at the time he sees it, but he retains the right to modify that offer to accord with different terms inserted by underwriters taking subsequent lines, the intention being that, in the absence of special agreement to the contrary, all the offers ultimately evidenced by the initialled slip shall be on identical terms. The extent to which an amendment by an underwriter involves the broker in a duty to resubmit the slip to an underwriter who has previously taken a line without the amendment is a matter to be determined in accordance with the practice of the market, but all underwriters are to be deemed to have offered to accept the risk for their respective proportions on the terms of the slip in its finally amended form, whether or not they know of subsequent amendments. Market practice and discipline can be relied on to protect their interests. Leaving on one side nice points founded on the ancient doctrine of consideration which I am sure that the market would disdain to take, the offers remain open to acceptance by the assured until the risk is fully subscribed or the assured through his broker resiles from the transaction or the assured through his broker affirms the transaction although not fully subscribed, whichever first occurs.

d Since the conclusion of the argument, I have had an opportunity of looking at the decision of Mathew J in *Thompson v Adams*¹ and of Hamilton J in *Grover & Grover Ltd v Mathews*², both of which are cited in Ivamy's General Principles of Insurance Law³ in support of the following paragraph in the text:

i "The initialling of the "slip" by the underwriter is the acceptance of the assured's proposal. He thereby binds himself to sign a policy in accordance with the "slip", when tendered to him for signature, and he cannot refuse to do so except upon grounds which call in question the validity of the acceptance. The signing of a policy is, however, a mere formality; it may take place even after loss, and the underwriter cannot refuse to sign the policy on the ground that the broker failed to tender it within a reasonable time after the initialling of the "slip". The contract is complete upon the initialling of the "slip", and, if there is no formal policy in existence, the underwriter may be sued upon the "slip". The "slip" is not a mere honorary undertaking to issue a policy; it constitutes in itself a binding contract of insurance.

3 2nd Edn, 1970, p 85

These cases do, I think, justify the text, but they were not concerned with the status of a slip between the time when an individual underwriter first takes a line and the time when the risk is fully subscribed. Once it is fully subscribed, I accept that it constitutes a contract, but before that moment is reached I think that business efficacy requires that it be treated as an offer by the underwriters. This has no bearing on the contra proferentem rule of construction which treats the slip as having been proffered by the assured (see *De Maurier (Jewels) Ltd v Bastion Insurance Co Ltd and Coronet Insurance Co Ltd*⁴) insofar as he or his broker is the author of its wording or puts it forward. It follows that in my judgment the terms of any risk insured by Excess fall to be determined by reference to the slip in its finally amended form.

It occurred to me that if, as the letter of 10th July implied, it was open to Mr Jaglom to accept or reject the proposed new insurance, it must follow that Excess were not on risk under the new insurance at the time of the loss, but were on risk under the pre-existing 50s per cent policy whose cancellation was clearly contingent on the conclusion of a new contract. However, both Excess and the brokers seemed to be agreed that this was not the case and that from some date which they could not define more precisely than that it preceded the loss, the 50s per cent policy was cancelled and the new cover substituted, both retrospectively to 4th June 1968.

One further fact should be mentioned. The slip called for monthly declarations and on 6th August nearly a month after the loss and two months after the date on which the cover retrospectively came into operation, the brokers sought to declare all the jewellery as being out of the bank for a period of three months from 4th June. This was a very odd procedure as the declaration was out of time for the earlier part of the period and premature for the latter part. It may, however, have been in time for the period in which the loss occurred. Fortunately it is not necessary to explore this further, because, whilst it was not accepted by Excess or any other underwriter, counsel for Excess does not wish to take any point on this aspect of the problem.

The argument of counsel for Excess proceeds by the following stages. First, the primary cover is against all risks whilst in the custody of the assured's bank. This, he submits, is plain on the face of the slip. He takes no point on the fact that no particular bank was ever agreed on with the leading underwriter. Secondly, the secondary or extended cover only applies in respect of individual items which are taken out of the custody of the bank. This, also, he submits, is clear on the face of the slip for, as a matter of plain English, jewellery which has never been in the custody of the bank during the currency of the risk, cannot be taken out of its custody. I am not sure that the language necessarily requires that the jewellery shall have been in the custody of the bank during the currency of the risk, but this does not matter on the facts of the present case for there is no evidence that the jewellery was ever in the custody of any bank. Thirdly, bearing in mind that the assured was retrospectively giving up a largely unrestricted all risks cover at 50s per cent per annum for cover which, if the jewellery was not in the bank, was potentially much more expensive, underwriters were entitled to assume that the jewellery was in fact in the bank when the slip was proffered. The presence of the jewels in the bank at that time was therefore the basis of the policy. Fourthly, whether or not underwriters would be entitled in strict law to say that the whole policy was void, Excess a did not seek to do this, but submitted only that they did not come on risk until the jewellery had been taken into the custody of the bank. Thereafter, if the appropriate advice was given before the jewellery was taken out of the bank's custody, the extended cover would apply. Fifthly, if, contrary to these submissions, 'taken out of the bank' can be construed as 'being out of the bank', no prior advice was given to the brokers within the meaning of the policy. There were two independent grounds for this submission. First 'advice' in this context means 'information given' b and imports an express communication by the assured to the broker. It is not the same as the broker in fact having knowledge or notice of the fact that the jewellery is out of the bank, still less inferring or assuming this fact. Second, on 4th June, which was the latest date on which the broker could have received advice of the position of the jewellery, the slip was not in existence and he was not the broker c under the cover or authorised by underwriters to receive advice for the purposes of the cover.

Counsel for the brokers submits that when retrospective cover is arranged, each underwriter undertakes the same obligation as he would have undertaken if he had initialled the slip immediately before the time from which the cover is agreed to take effect—in this case noon on 4th June 1968. It follows that unless one is to under- d take a fine analysis involving minutes rather than hours, the brokers were retrospectively authorised to receive advice for the purposes of the cover on 4th June. Turning to the earlier submissions, he says that there is no magic about the use of the word 'extend' in the slip. This is pure market jargon. The reality and the intention of the parties was that there should be two alternative degrees of cover with appropriately e different premiums. There is no underwriting merit in the suggestion that the jewellery has first to have been in the custody of the bank before the higher degree of risk can be impressed on underwriters, because the fact that previously the jewellery has been subject to a lesser degree of risk, incidentally attracting a lower premium, in no way affects the degree or nature of the risk, or the amount of the premium, f for the period when it is not in the custody of the bank. Prior advice must indeed be given for the protection of the underwriters, but this only means that the broker must know that the jewellery is out of the bank and can, therefore, be relied on to account to underwriters, and extract from the assured, a premium appropriate to that risk for the whole of the relevant period.

In substance I prefer the argument for the brokers as according more with common sense and the commercial realities. Underwriters were accepting alternative risks in consideration of alternative premiums, it being entirely at the assured's option g which risk applied at any time and for how long it applied. Mrs Jaglom could, if she wished, have placed the jewellery in the bank for the whole period of the insurance and paid the 3s 6d rate. Alternatively she could have kept the jewellery out of the bank for the whole period and paid an appropriate additional premium which might well have been as high as 80s per cent. In the further alternative she could have opted for any combination of these risks, paying the appropriate additional h premiums. Subject to their plea that they are not on risk at all until the jewellery comes into the custody of the bank, all this is admitted by Excess. But what possible underwriting point is there in a formal delivery into the custody of the bank and an immediate return of the jewellery to Mrs Jaglom? Yet that would satisfy underwriters' requirements. It is, in my judgment, complete nonsense and was not a requirement of the cover. If underwriters really wanted this they could have required i a warranty that the jewellery was in the custody of the bank at some stated time or date. They did not do so. The wording of the slip on which counsel for Excess placed such reliance does not advance underwriters' case. The use of the word 'extend' in the context of this slip means no more than that underwriters are accepting a second risk in addition to the first. The use of the words 'taken out of the bank' does no more than reflect the fact that the bank custody risk comes first on the slip and that it was no doubt contemplated that the jewellery would be more in the bank than out of it. If the risk has been written the other way round so that the 'extended' risk came first, the reference to the bank custody risk would have no doubt been in terms of a 3s 6d rate 'in respect of jewellery put into the bank'. a

There is slightly more substance in counsel for Excess's argument based on 'prior advice to G H Fryer', in that this reflects a real business point. In any policy of this nature it is essential that the assured shall be unable to have the benefit of cover in respect of a greater risk whilst only paying the lower premium unless and until a loss occurs. This is the case however honest the assured may be and no one suggests that Mrs Jaglom is other than completely honest and respectable. On the other hand, underwriters do not want to be bothered with information concerning every minor excursion of every item of jewellery. The practical answer to this dilemma is to provide that the broker shall be advised of all movements of jewellery before they take place and that he, having no financial interest in minimising the premium, shall be responsible for accounting to underwriters on a monthly basis in arrear. This practical solution is fully met if the broker knows that the jewellery is leaving or, at the inception of the policy, is outside the custody of the bank. In such circumstances the broker is obliged to account for the higher premium and the assured cannot refuse to reimburse him. No business purpose is served by any more formal requirement. On 4th June both Mr Jaglom and Mr Dunkley knew that the jewellery was not in the custody of the bank. Is it seriously to be suggested that Mr Dunkley should then or thereafter have said to the Jagloms, 'You must advise me that the jewellery is not in the bank?' Counsel for Excess said that Mr Dunkley should never have agreed to the backdating of the new policy until 4th June 1968, if the jewellery was outside the bank, because the relevant premium under the new policy was then higher than the old. It may well be that Mr Dunkley should not have done this if he could have avoided it, but that would be a breach of his duty as a broker and would not affect the underwriters' liability. As things were Mr Dunkley involved Mrs Jaglom in a liability to pay the higher rate of premium from 4th June, until such time as the jewellery was put into the custody of the bank and the brokers learnt of this fact. 'Prior advice' in this contract has no technical meaning. If the underwriters wanted such formality as they now claim, they should have written in 'subject to prior notice in writing by assured to Geo H Fryer'. If necessary, I would hold that these words being an amendment by underwriters, although possibly not by Excess, fall to be construed contra proferentem, namely, against underwriters as a whole. No authority to the contrary has, so far as I know, been concerned with an underwriters' amendment to a slip prepared by a broker. However I do not think it is necessary to rely on this rule and that the meaning of the words in their business context is clear and unambiguous. b

- c The accused who was driving his car at night without proper lights was stopped by a police constable. Smelling alcohol on the accused's breath the constable, in exercise of his powers under s 2 of the Road Safety Act 1967, required the accused to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test. Since the accused had drunk his last alcoholic drink only some five minutes previously, it was necessary to wait some time before the breath test could be properly administered. Whilst waiting the accused asked to go to the lavatory at his brother's house nearby. On the way he met a man who had been a passenger in the car and who was carrying a bottle of whisky. The accused took the bottle and drank from it. The purpose and effect of doing this was to make it impossible to ascertain from a laboratory test of a specimen which he might subsequently provide under s 3 of the 1967 Act, whether he had been driving with an excessive quantity of alcohol in his blood. On a charge of wilfully obstructing a constable in the execution of his duty contrary to s 51 (3)^a of the Police Act 1964 the accused contended that the act relied on by the prosecution as constituting the obstruction must, in addition to being an act which made it more difficult for the police to carry out their duty, be unlawful per se, i.e. unlawful as contravening some law independently of the law which prohibited the obstruction of police officers, and that his act in drinking the whisky was not per se unlawful.

- e Held – Although a refusal to act could not amount to obstruction under s 51 (3) unless the accused was under a legal obligation to act in the manner requested by the police officer, there was no ground for saying that where the obstruction consisted of a positive act it must be unlawful independently of its operation as an obstruction of a police officer under s 51 (3). The act of the accused in drinking the whisky with the object and effect of frustrating the procedure under ss 2 and 3 of the 1967 Act was clearly a wilful obstruction of the police constable (see p 279 f to p 280 b, post).

This was a case stated by the deputy recorder of Folkestone (Mark Smith Esq) in respect of his adjudication on 5th April 1971 whereby he allowed an appeal by the respondent, Alan Alexander Dibble, against his conviction on 9th February 1971 by the justices for the borough of Folkestone in respect of an information preferred by the appellant, Roy Dennis Ingleton, a chief inspector of police, for having wilfully obstructed a constable in the execution of his duty contrary to the Police Act 1964, s 51 (3). The facts are set out in the judgment of Bridge J. d

Brian Clapham for the appellant.

F J M Marr-Johnson for the respondent. e

BRIDGE J delivered the first judgment at the invitation of Lord Widgery CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from a decision of Folkestone Borough Quarter Sessions given by the learned deputy recorder on 5th April 1971. On 9th February 1971 the respondent, Alan Alexander Dibble, was convicted by a magistrates' court of wilfully obstructing a police constable in the execution of his duty. The respondent appealed from that conviction to quarter sessions. At the hearing before quarter sessions and at the close of the evidence called for the prosecution a submission was made on his behalf that the evidence disclosed no offence in law and that submission was upheld by the deputy recorder, who accordingly allowed the appeal against the conviction by the justices. From that decision the appellant prosecutor now appeals to this court. f

The facts disclosed by the evidence called for the prosecution are these. On 15th October 1970 in the early hours of the morning Pc Tully was on duty in uniform in Folkestone when he saw the respondent driving a motor car which was not showing proper lights. He stopped the respondent and immediately smelled alcohol on his breath, whereupon in the exercise of his powers under s 2 of the Road Safety Act 1967 he required the respondent to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test. Pausing there, no point is taken as to the propriety of that requirement under the Act. g

The respondent got out of his car, which was moved away presumably by another police officer. The respondent then told Pc Tully that he had had his last alcoholic drink only about five minutes before, whereupon the officer appreciated that it would be necessary to wait some time before the provision of a specimen of breath for a test. That necessity to wait arose from the circumstance, now widely known, that the manufacturer's directions issued with the Alcotest device used by the police in this country, as approved by the Secretary of State, for taking breath tests, indicate that a specimen given within twenty minutes of the last consumption of alcohol may give a false reading on the device because of alcohol in the mouth. The respondent agreed to wait, but after a little while he asked if he could go to the lavatory. h a The police constable agreed. They went to a nearby public lavatory which was found to be in a dirty condition. The respondent then suggested that he should go to his brother's house which was nearby and use the lavatory there. Again the police constable agreed. On the way to the brother's house the respondent and the constable met the respondent's brother accompanied by a man who had been a passenger in the respondent's car while it was being driven. The passenger was carrying a bottle of whisky. The respondent took it from him and drank from the bottle.

b On the basis that that evidence was accepted, the deputy recorder inferred, in my judgment quite rightly, that the respondent deliberately drank the whisky with the intention of making it impossible for it to be ascertained from a laboratory test of a specimen which he might subsequently provide under s 3 of the Road Safety Act 1967 whether the quantity of alcohol which he had consumed before he had ceased to drive was such that an offence under s 1 of the Act was committed. The c deputy recorder nevertheless held that that action did not in law amount to a wilful obstruction of the police constable under s 51 (3) of the Police Act 1964.

To understand the submissions made to this court, it is first necessary to remind oneself briefly of the relevant provisions of the Road Safety Act 1967, and of certain decisions of the House of Lords as to the construction of those provisions. It will

d be remembered that a person commits an offence under s 1 (1) of the Act if he drives a motor vehicle having consumed alcohol in such quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood as ascertained from a laboratory test for which he subsequently gives a specimen under s 3 of the Act exceeds the prescribed limit. The procedure leading to the provision of a specimen which can be tested in the laboratory is laid down, as is now well known, in ss 2 and 3. It begins with a suspicion that the driver has

e alcohol in his body under s 2 (1) (a), or a suspicion that he has committed a traffic offence while his vehicle was in motion under s 2 (1) (b), or on the other hand with the occurrence of an accident under sub-s (2). Given one of those foundations, a constable may require the driver to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test, and if he either fails to do so or provides a specimen which proves positive, he may then be arrested and taken to the police station where the procedure under s 3 begins. It is unnecessary to go in detail through the procedure under s 3. It is an

f elaborate procedure leading in the end to the provision by the suspect driver of a specimen either of his blood or of his urine which can be analysed.

The House of Lords has decided in *Rowlands v Hamilton*¹ that on the true construction of s 1 of the Act the quantity of alcohol consumed by a driver before he ceased driving can only be validly ascertained from a laboratory test within the meaning of s 1 (1) so as to prove an offence under the subsection if the specimen is

g taken at a time when no additional alcohol has entered the driver's body after he ceased to drive and before the specimen was provided.

The question arose in that case because the accused had been involved in an accident, and, being shaken and shocked as a result of the accident, before the police arrived he went into a public house and drank a quantity of whisky. At his trial for an offence under s 1, the prosecution sought to prove that he had consumed alcohol in the necessary quantity to constitute an offence under sub-s (1) by calling expert evidence to establish that a test of his blood would have shown him to be above the prescribed limit even if his blood had been tested before he drank the whisky in the public house. In other words the expert was saying: making all allowances proper to be made for the quantity of alcohol consumed after this driver ceased to h drive, the laboratory test still shows that before he ceased to drive he was a person who had consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit. The House of Lords, as I have said, held that that was not a

is that as soon as a person who has been driving, after he has ceased to drive, consumes any alcohol, it becomes once and for all impossible to test his blood under s 3 in such a way that the test will be available to prove an offence under s 1. a

Counsel for the appellant has also drawn our attention to an earlier decision of the House of Lords which was concerned with the problem arising when a police officer discovers that a suspect driver whom he has stopped and whom he has required to provide a specimen, has had a drink recently, so that some time must be allowed to elapse in order that the breath test shall be valid. This is *Director of Public Prosecutions v Carey*², where Lord Diplock advertent to this problem said: b

'In any of these cases where a constable believes that the suspect has consumed alcohol within 20 minutes of his being stopped a test conducted by the constable before 20 minutes had elapsed since the suspect's last drink would not be a bona fide use of the device for the purpose of obtaining a reliable indication of the proportion of alcohol in the suspect's blood. But the object of the Act cannot be evaded in this way. The statutory right conferred on a constable by s. 2 (1) of the Act to require a person "to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test" carries with it by necessary implication the right to require that person to remain there or nearby until a "breath test" is completed, even if this means that he must wait there until the effect of recently consumed alcohol has worn off sufficiently to enable him to provide a specimen of breath which when used in the approved device will give a reliable indication of his true blood alcohol level.'

It is in reliance of those two authorities that counsel for the appellant makes his submission that this was a plain case of wilful obstruction of the constable in the execution of his duty. He refers us to the decision of this court approving and adopting an earlier definition of what is necessary to show a wilful obstruction, *Rice v Connolly*³, where Lord Parker CJ said: c

'To carry the matter a little further, it is in my view clear that to "obstruct" under s. 51 (3) [of the Police Act 1964] is to do any act which makes it more difficult for the police to carry out their duty. That description of obstructing I take from . . . *Hinchliffe v. Sheldon*⁴. It is also in my judgment clear that it is part of the obligations and duties of a police constable to take all steps which appear to him necessary for keeping the peace, for preventing crime or for protecting property from criminal injury. There is no exhaustive definition of the powers and obligations of the police, but they are at least those, and they would further include the duty to detect crime and to bring an offender to justice.'

So, counsel for the appellant submits, here was Pc Tully setting in motion the statutory machinery under the Road Safety Act 1967 with the object of detecting whether or not the respondent had committed an offence under s 1, and, if so, of obtaining the evidence to bring him to justice therefor. The respondent's act deliberately done with the object of frustrating that procedure not only, so counsel for the appellant submits, in Lord Parker CJ's language made it more difficult for Pc Tully to carry out his duty, it made it impossible. d

Counsel for the respondent, at the end of the argument, accepts, and in my judgment quite rightly accepts, first that Pc Tully was acting in the execution of his duty; and secondly that he was de facto obstructed by what the respondent did in taking the whisky bottle and drinking whisky from it. Counsel for the respondent nevertheless submits that there was no offence under s 51 (3) of the Police Act 1964 because the obstruction was not wilful. The essence of the submission, as I understand it, e a is that the act which is relied on by the prosecution as constituting the obstruction must in addition to being an act which makes it more difficult for the police to carry out their duty, be unlawful per se, i.e. unlawful as contravening some law independently of the law which prohibits the obstruction of police officers.

b Counsel for the respondent has referred to two cases of AA scouts warning passing motorists of police speed traps, *Bastable v Little*⁵ and *Betts v Stevens*⁶. For my part I do not find that those authorities throw any light whatever on the question which we have to decide. More to the point is *Rice v Connolly*⁷ to which I have already referred. That was a case on its facts concerned with a defendant who appeared to a police constable to have been acting suspiciously and the police constable asked him to give his name and address which the defendant refused to do. That refusal was the subject-matter of the prosecution; that was the alleged obstruction of the police constable. Counsel for the respondent relies on a passage from the judgment of Lord Parker CJ following the passage I have already quoted where he said⁸:

c 'The only remaining element of the alleged offence, and the one on which in my judgment this case depends, is whether the obstructing of which the appellant was guilty was a wilful obstruction. "Wilful" in this context in my judgment means not only "intentional" but also connotes something which is done without lawful excuse, and that indeed is conceded by counsel who appears for the prosecution in this case.'

d Lord Parker CJ went on to consider whether there was a lawful excuse in the circumstances of that case for the appellant refusing to answer the police officer's question, and refusing to disclose his name and address. Lord Parker CJ decided that there was; accordingly in the circumstances no offence of wilful obstruction e had been committed. He drew a distinction between a person giving false information to a police constable which he thought would clearly amount to an obstruction, and a person declining to give information which he held could not amount to obstruction unless the situation was one in which the law placed him under an obligation to give the information required.

f For my part I would draw a clear distinction between a refusal to act, on the one hand, and the doing of some positive act on the other. In a case, as in *Rice v Connolly*⁷, where the obstruction alleged consists of a refusal by the defendant to do the act which the police constable has asked him to do—to give information, it might be, or to give assistance to the police constable—one can see readily the soundness of the principle, if I may say so with respect, applied in *Rice v Connolly*⁷, that such a refusal to act cannot amount to a wilful obstruction under s 51 unless the law imposes g on the person concerned some obligation in the circumstances to act in the manner requested by the police officer.

h On the other hand, I can see no basis in principle or in any authority which has been cited for saying that where the obstruction consists of a positive act, it must be unlawful independently of its operation as an obstruction of a police constable under s 51 (3) of the Police Act 1964. If the act relied on as an obstruction had to be shown to be an offence independently of its effect as an obstruction, it is difficult to see what use there would be in the provisions of s 51 (3) of the 1964 Act.

i In my judgment the act of the respondent in drinking whisky when he did with the object and effect of frustrating the procedure under ss 2 and 3 of the Road Safety Act 1967 clearly was a wilful obstruction of Pc Tully. The learned deputy recorder in my judgment erred in upholding the submission of no case which was made to him and I would allow the appeal and send the case back to quarter sessions with a direction to continue the hearing.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. I agree with the judgment of Bridge J, particularly I would emphasise the importance of his distinction between obstruction which is alleged to consist of a default, and obstruction which is alleged to consist of a positive act.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

DONALDSON J

11th, 12th, 22nd OCTOBER 1971

Industrial training – Training board – Establishment – Consultation – Duty of Minister to consult with specified organisations appearing to him to be representative of those engaged in industry – Failure to consult – Effect – Failure to consult association – Association a specialist branch of parent body – Consultation with parent body – Appropriate invitation for comments on draft order sent by Minister to association – Invitation not received by association – Association having no knowledge of order until after it was made – Whether Minister under duty to consult association – Whether consultation with parent body and sending of invitation for comments constituting consultation – Whether order applicable to members of association – Industrial Training Act 1964, s 1 (4) – Industrial Training (Agricultural, Horticultural and Forestry Board) Order 1966 (SI 1966 No 969). e

In 1965 the Minister of Labour had plans to set up a training board for the agricultural, horticultural and forestry industry under the provisions of the Industrial Training Act 1964. Preliminary consultations were held with the National Farmers Union ('the NFU'). By April 1966 a draft order had been prepared and a copy of the schedule defining the industry to which it related was circulated to a large number of addressees inviting comments. At the same time a press notice was published summarising the activities which it was proposed should be covered by the new board and advising any organisation which considered that it had an interest in the draft schedule and had not received a copy to apply to the Minister. Among the addressees to whom the draft schedule was sent was the Mushroom Growers Association ('the association') which was a specialist branch of the NFU, although largely autonomous. The membership of the NFU was approximately 150,000, of whom about 180 were full members of the association. The association was not represented on the NFU council but a representative was invited to attend when matters relating to mushroom growing were discussed. No comments were received from the association in response to the invitation accompanying the draft schedule and no application was made for a copy of it. The order^a constituting the board was made on 2nd August f a 1966 and came into operation on 15th August. It subsequently emerged that the association had never received a copy of the draft schedule and had no knowledge of the press notice or of the consultations which had taken place between the NFU and the Minister. The association contended that it was not bound by the order on the ground that, before making it, the Minister was under a duty to consult the association since it was an organisation 'appearing to him' to be within one of the categories of organisations which, under s 1 (4)^b of the 1964 Act, he was bound to consult.

Held – (i) The expression 'any organisation' in s 1 (4) meant that the Minister was under a duty to consult 'every' organisation which appeared to him to be an organisation which fell within the provisions of s 1 (4) and not merely one such organisation; in view of the importance which was attached to consultation in the scheme of the Act, and the fact that the Minister had not in terms stated that the association did not appear to him to fall within s 1 (4) it followed that the association was a body which had to be consulted (see p 284 d and p 285 c d and f, post).

c (ii) No consultation had taken place with the association for the mere sending of a letter which was not received was but an attempt to consult; the essence of consultation was the communication of a genuine invitation, extended with a receptive mind, to give advice (see p 284 e and f and p 285 g, post); Rollo v Minister of Town and Country Planning [1948] 1 All ER 13 applied.

d (iii) Although, prima facie, consultation with a parent body would constitute consultation with the constituent parts, this general rule did not apply in the present case since the Minister had attempted and intended direct consultation with the association as well as with the NFU (see p 285 e and g, post).

e (iv) Accordingly the 1966 order had no application to persons engaged in the growing of mushrooms solely by reason of their being so engaged (see p 283 h and p 285 h, post).

Adjourned summons

g By an originating summons dated 1st January 1970 the Agricultural, Horticultural and Forestry Industry Training Board ('the board') sought the determination of the court whether, on the true construction of s 1 (4) of the Industrial Training Act 1964, the Minister of Labour (subsequently the Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity) was under a duty to consult the Mushroom Growers Association ('the association') before establishing a training board for the agricultural, horticultural and forestry industry, whether on the facts the Minister had consulted the association, and, if not, what was the effect of such failure on the provisions of the Industrial Training (Agricultural, Horticultural and Forestry Board) Order 1966^c. There were joined as defendants Aylesbury Mushrooms Ltd on their own behalf and as representatives of the members of the association. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Cur adv vult

22nd October. DONALDSON J read the following judgment. The Industrial Training Act 1964 makes provision for the establishment of industrial training boards which, as their name implies, arrange industrial training for those employed in the industries concerned. The expenses of the boards are defrayed out of a levy imposed on employers in the industry, subject to such exceptions as may be specified in the order constituting any particular board.

Section 1 (4) of the Act provides:

'Before making an industrial training order the Minister shall consult any organisation or association of organisations appearing to him to be representative of substantial numbers of employers engaging in the activities concerned and any organisation or association of organisations appearing to him to be representative of substantial numbers of persons employed in those activities; and if those activities are carried on to a substantial extent by a body established for the purpose of carrying on under national ownership any industry or part of an industry or undertaking, shall also consult that body.'

In the present proceedings the Agricultural, Horticultural and Forestry Industry Training Board seek a determination whether the Minister complied with his duty of consultation before making the order which established that board, and, if not, what are the consequences. The real defendants are the Mushroom Growers Association, but that is an unincorporated body and it has been thought more convenient that the nominal defendants should be Aylesbury Mushrooms Ltd, who are representatives of the membership of the association.

In the second half of 1965 the then Minister of Labour was minded to set up the plaintiff board and, as is customary, officials of his Ministry held preliminary consultations with the largest representative body concerned, namely the National Farmers Union. By April 1966 a draft order had been prepared. An advance copy of the schedule to the order, which defined the industry to which the order related, was sent to the National Farmers Union on 15th April 1966. On 26th April 1966 copies of this document were circulated to a large number of addressees, including the Mushroom Growers Association, inviting comments. Simultaneously there was a press notice summarising the activities which it was proposed should be covered by the new board and advising any organisation which considered that it had an interest in the draft schedule and which had not received a copy to apply to the Ministry of Labour. No comments were received from the Mushroom Growers Association and no application was made by them for a copy of the schedule.

The Minister of Labour made the order constituting the board on 2nd August 1966, it was laid before Parliament on 11th August and came into operation on 15th August. Still there was no comment from the Mushroom Growers Association. I was told that the vice-chairman of the association knew of the existence of the order by October 1967, but on the evidence filed in this case the first clear sign of hostility or indeed any activity by the Mushroom Growers Association towards the board occurred on 16th May 1968, when Mr Alderton, the secretary, wrote to the board. The letter is headed 'Mushroom Growers Association. Specialist branch of the National Farmers Union'. The text reads as follows:

'Dear Sir, This Association, on behalf of Mushroom Growers, herewith makes formal application to be completely excluded from the Industrial Training Act, 1964, on the grounds [and then he sets out various grounds for exclusion and adds:] This application has the full support of the parent body of this Association, The National Farmers Union.'

In subsequent correspondence it emerged for the first time that the Mushroom Growers Association had never received a copy of the draft schedule and had no knowledge of the consultations which took place between the Minister and the a National Farmers Union between September 1965 and April 1966. It is implicit in the evidence filed, although not I think expressed, that the Mushroom Growers Association were also unaware of the contents of the press notice.

b All this is rather surprising because the Mushroom Growers Association is a specialist branch of the National Farmers Union which, although largely autonomous, in 1966 occupied the same premises as the headquarters of the National Farmers Union, albeit as sub-tenants of part for which they paid an economic rent and of which they no doubt had exclusive possession. My surprise was not diminished when I was referred to r 2 (1) (b) of Part IX of the Rules of the National Farmers Union which provides:

c 'A notice to be served on the Council or on any branch may be given by sending it by post to the General Secretary of the Union at the offices for the time being of the Council, or to the Secretary of the branch at the office for the time being of the branch, as the case may be.'

Presumably independence is not carried to the point at which notices of correspondence addressed to the Mushroom Growers Association which end up with the National Farmers Union are not normally passed on to the intended recipient.

d Presumably, too, independence does not in any way inhibit consultation on matters of mutual concern.

The interrelationship of the National Farmers Union and the Mushroom Growers Association has been the subject-matter of an agreed statement of facts, but the only further information to which I need refer is contained in paragraphs 8-10 of that statement which are in these terms:

e 'The membership of N.F.U. is approximately 150,000; of these about 180 are full grower members of M.G.A., 154 carrying on business in England and Wales, 5 in Scotland and 21 in Northern Ireland. M.G.A. is not represented in its own right on the N.F.U. Council, although a representative is invited to attend when matters relating to mushroom growing are discussed; N.F.U. is not represented

f in its own right at meetings of M.G.A. N.F.U. nominates the employers' representatives on the Agricultural Wages Board for the whole of the agricultural and horticultural industry. N.F.U. handles all matters connected with the annual price review, obtaining information where necessary from M.G.A.; mushroom prices are outside the review system, but mushroom growers are affected by, for example, changes in the fertilizer subsidy. M.G.A. deals directly with the g Ministry of Agriculture on specific points relating to mushroom growing and informs N.F.U. thereof.'

Both parties are agreed that under the terms of s 1 (4) of the Act, some consultation by the Minister is mandatory and that in the absence of any particular consultation which is so required, the persons who should have been but were not consulted are not bound by the order, although the order remains effective in relation to all

h others who were in fact consulted or whom there was no need to consult. Both parties are further agreed that if consultation with the Mushroom Growers Association was mandatory and there was no or no sufficient consultation the order takes effect according to its terms subject to a rider that it does not apply to the growing of mushrooms or to persons engaged in this activity solely by reason of their being i so engaged. They may, of course, come within the scope of the order in some other capacity.

Both parties are also agreed that the organisations required to be consulted are those which appear to the Minister, or to his alter ego who in this case was a Mr Devey, to be representative of substantial numbers of employers engaging in the activities concerned or persons employed therein and nationalised industries which engage in those activities to a substantial extent. Thus whether any particular organisation has to be consulted depends on a subjective test, subject always to bona fides and reasonableness which are not in question. a

Against this background counsel for the association submits that the court must see what organisations appeared to the Minister to fall into the specified categories, that the Minister clearly sought to consult the Mushroom Growers Association thereby showing that he regarded it as being within the class of organisation which had to be consulted. It follows, as he submits, that neither the board nor the Minister can now turn round and say that consultation with the National Farmers Union constituted a sufficient discharge of his duties. Counsel goes on to submit that there can be no consultation without at least unilateral communication and that no such communication occurred. b

Counsel for the board submitted that 'any' in the phrase 'the Minister shall consult any organisation' imposed a duty to consult not more than one organisation, that the posting of the letter of 26th April 1966 constituted consultation with the Mushroom Growers Association despite the fact that it was never received, that the Mushroom Growers Association was not an organisation which had to be consulted and that consultation with the National Farmers Union involved consultation with all its branches including the Mushroom Growers Association. c

I have no doubt that the first point of counsel for the board is without foundation. 'Any' must mean 'every' in the context of s 1 (4). There is a little more to be said for his submission that the mere sending of the letter of 26th April 1966 constituted consultation in that the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary gives as one definition of the verb 'to consult', 'to ask advice of, seek counsel from; to have recourse to for instruction or professional advice'. However, in truth the mere sending of a letter constitutes but an attempt to consult and this does not suffice. The essence of consultation is the communication of a genuine invitation, extended with a receptive mind, to give advice (see per Bucknill LJ¹ approving a dictum of Morris J in *Rollo v Minister of Town and Country Planning*²). If the invitation is once received, it matters not that it is not accepted and no advice is proffered. Were it otherwise organisations with a right to be consulted could, in effect, veto the making of any order by simply failing to respond to the invitation. But without communication and the consequent opportunity of responding, there can be no consultation. d e f

This leaves only the related questions whether the Mushroom Growers Association did in fact appear to the Minister to be an organisation falling within the categories set out in s 1 (4) with the consequence that he was under an obligation to consult them and whether in any event his consultations with the National Farmers Union constituted consultation with the Mushroom Growers Association as a branch of the NFU. This is the heart of the problem. g

Mr Devey has deposed in para 5 of his affidavit that:

'In accordance with practice the circulation of the draft schedule was not restricted to organisations that appeared to me to be representative of substantial numbers of employers engaging in activities specified in the draft schedule. This will appear sufficiently from a perusal of the document. In particular the Mushroom Growers Association was listed, although it was, and remains, a specialist branch of the National Farmers Union. The listed address of the Association is the same as that of the Union which is Agriculture House, Knightsbridge, London, S.W.1.' h

In each case he sent a covering letter in one of three forms. The addressees on the first list, such as the National Farmers Union, the Trades Union Congress, the Confederation of British Industry, and major government departments received special letters from Mr Devey. Those on the second list received letters which were in j a standard form but were sent personally to named officials of the organisations concerned. These included the Local Government Examinations Board which clearly is an organisation which should have been consulted, but not one which in the terms of the Act had to be consulted. Those on the third list, including the Mushroom Growers Association, received or should have received letters in standard form addressed to the organisation impersonally. I can find no clue in the form of the covering letter to whether any particular addressee appeared to the Minister to be a s 1 (4) organisation and examples can be found in each list of organisations which plainly fall outside this category. I am thus thrown back on Mr Devey's affidavit coupled with a letter dated 20th January 1969, signed by a Mr Thomson of the Department of Employment and Productivity, which states that a copy of the draft schedule was sent to the National Farmers Union of which it is understood that the Mushroom Growers Association is a specialist branch 'and also as a matter of courtesy to the Association'. Bearing in mind the importance which attaches to consultation in the scheme of the Industrial Training Act 1964, which seems to be based on the healthy principle of 'no taxation without consultation', and the fact that Mr Devey has not in terms said that the association did not appear to him to fall within the scope of s 1 (4), I feel obliged to conclude that it was an organisation which had to be consulted, although its small membership in the context of the number of persons employed in agriculture, horticulture and forestry and the specialised nature of their activities could well have led the Minister to take a different view.

This only leaves the question of whether it was consulted vicariously, and it may be accidentally, by means of the consultations with the National Farmers Union. This is a nice point. Prima facie consultation with the parent body undoubtedly constitutes consultation with its constituent parts, but I think that this general rule is subject to an exception where, as here, the Minister has also attempted and intended direct consultation with a branch. The association's complaint has very little merit, because it seems to have been completely blind to all that was going on around it. Nevertheless it is important that statutory powers which involve taxation shall be strictly construed and, so construed, I consider that the association should have been consulted and was not consulted.

I therefore answer the question in the originating summons as follows: Whether before making an order establishing a training board for the agricultural, horticultural and forestry industry, the Minister was under a duty to consult the Mushroom Growers Association—Yes. Whether the consultations held by the Minister with the National Farmers Union constituted a sufficient consultation with an organisation or an association of organisations representative of those engaged in the activity of horticulture—No. If it be held that the Minister was under a duty to consult the Mushroom Growers Association, whether on the facts such consultation took place—No. If it be held that the Minister was under a duty to consult the Mushroom Growers Association and failed to do so, what effect such failure had on the provisions of the Industrial Training (Agricultural, Horticultural and Forestry Board) Order 1966³. The order has no application to mushroom growers as such.

Ruling accordingly.

1. It is necessary to draw attention to r 68 of the Magistrates' Courts Rules 1968¹, the terms of which are frequently disregarded. Every magistrates' case should contain a full statement of the facts proved or admitted, and should not contain any statement of the evidence unless it is to be contended that there was no evidence to support a particular finding of fact. The case should follow Form 148² of the Schedule to the Magistrates' Courts (Forms) Rules 1968³ as closely as possible.

2. Much of the prevalent delay in stating the magistrates' case is attributable to the belief that the appellant must obtain a copy of the magistrates' clerk's notes of the evidence before drafting the case. In simple cases when the appellant was professionally represented at the hearing this should be unnecessary.

- c The husband and the wife, who were married in 1966, were on very bad terms by August 1969 and from November 1969 slept in separate bedrooms in the matrimonial home. They continued to take their meals, cooked by the wife, together, often in the company of one or both of their children. They also shared the cleaning of the house making no distinction between one part of the house and the other, but the wife no longer did any washing for the husband. The only reason why the husband
- d continued to live in the house was his wish to live with and help look after the children. In May 1971 the husband left the matrimonial home and in November presented a petition for divorce under s 2 (1) (d) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969. The question then arose whether the parties had, within the meaning of s 2 (5)^a of the Act, been ‘living apart’ for a continuous period of two years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. The parties contended that on the true
- e construction of s 2 (5) husband and wife were to be treated as living apart unless they fulfilled two separate requirements (i) living with each other; (ii) living in the same household; and that as they had not in any real sense been living with each other they had for the purposes of the Act been ‘living apart’.

Held – (i) Section 2 (5) of the 1969 Act was declaratory of the existing law and did not lay down two separate requirements; the words ‘in the same household’ were words of limitation (see p 291 f and h, post).

(ii) Where, as in the present case, a husband and wife were sharing the same household, a rejection of a normal physical relationship coupled with an absence of normal affection was not sufficient to constitute ‘living apart’ (see p 291 e, post).

(iii) Accordingly between November 1969 and May 1971 the husband and wife were not living apart for the purposes of the 1969 Act (see p 291 j, post).

Petitions

In August 1969 the wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of cruelty and in his answer dated 22nd March 1971 the husband cross-prayed for divorce on the ground that the marriage had irretrievably broken down, alleging that the wife had behaved in such a way that he could not reasonably be expected to live with her. On 1st November 1971 the husband was given leave to file a petition for divorce under s 2 (1) (d) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 and his petition was transferred to the court to be consolidated with the existing proceedings. The facts are set out in the judgment. b

M I Tennant for the wife.

WRANGHAM J. In this case, by a petition granted by leave of the court and transferred to this court to be consolidated with the existing proceedings, the husband prays for a divorce on the ground that the marriage has broken down irretrievably, and relies on the allegations that the parties have lived apart for a continuous period of at least two years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, and that the wife agrees to a decree being granted. It was proved that the wife consented to the decree. There is no reason to suppose the marriage has not broken down irretrievably. The sole question was whether it was proved that the parties had lived apart for two years before the petition was presented, i e before 1st November 1971. d

The facts are not in dispute. The parties were married on 17th June 1966 and there are two children of the family, a boy of five and a girl of four. By August 1969 the parties were on very bad terms, although they still shared a bedroom at a house at 49 Belmont Road, Sutton, in Surrey. On 13th August 1969 the wife presented a petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty. Sometime towards the end of that month it was served on the husband. He thereupon left 49 Belmont Road and for five weeks lived with his mother. An attempt at reconciliation was then made. On 25th September 1969 the parties went on holiday to Majorca for three weeks and at the end of the holiday they returned together to 49 Belmont Road. However the reconciliation was not a success, and after three weeks, i e sometime in November 1969, the wife left the matrimonial bedroom. Thereafter she slept with the girl in one bedroom and the husband slept with the boy in the other. From then until 12th May 1971, when the husband left 49 Belmont Road, and went to live with his mother once more, the position remained unchanged. The wife and husband, although in separate rooms, usually took their meals together, cooked by the wife, often but not always in the company of one or both of the children. Two or three days a week the husband attended a meeting at his place of work. The cleaning of the house continued to be done by the wife, except on Fridays and Saturdays when she went out to work all day, and on those occasions it was done by the husband. 49 Belmont Road has a dining room, a living room, two bedrooms, a kitchen and a bathroom. The evidence does not suggest that any of these rooms was particularly allocated to either husband or wife except to the extent that the husband and the boy slept in one room and the wife and the girl in the other; and husband and wife, when they respectively cleaned the house, made no distinction between one part of the house and the other. In his evidence the husband referred to one of the rooms (not his bedroom) as 'the room we lived in'. The wife, however, did no washing e

- a for the husband. He made his own arrangements for that to be done elsewhere. The only reason why the husband continued to live in this way at 49 Belmont Road was his wish to continue to live with and help to look after the children. On these facts it seems to me to be beyond dispute that husband, wife and children were all living in the same household. There have, of course, been many cases in which it has been held under the former law that husband and wife were living apart even though they lived under the same roof: e.g. *Smith v Smith*¹ and *Wilkes v Wilkes*².
- b It is, however, to my mind plain that if this case were being considered under the old law it would be held that this husband and wife were living together up to 12th May 1971: see *Hopes v Hopes*³. But it is contended on the part of both the husband and the wife that the test under the new legislation is wholly different. Section 2 (5) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 provides that for the purposes of the Act, a husband and wife shall be treated as living apart unless they are living with each other in the same household. It is argued that the effect of this subsection is that spouses are to be treated as living apart unless they fulfil two separate requirements. First they must be living with each other; second, they must be living in the same household.
- c On the facts of this case it is said the parties may be said to be living in the same household but they were not in any real sense living with each other. The wife had done all she could to reject her husband as a husband and to break the matrimonial relation between them by refusing to share his bedroom. It is hard to see how husband and wife who share a household could ever be said not to be living with each other unless rejection of a normal physical relationship coupled with the absence of normal affection is sufficient for this purpose. But if the effect of s 2 (5) is that spouses are to be treated as living apart whenever one spouse has refused the right of intercourse, and they are (as of course they naturally would be in such circumstances)
- d on bad terms, that would mean that the law laid down in *Jackson v Jackson*⁴ has been altered, and I think that if Parliament had intended to do that, it would have done so specifically.

The truth, in my opinion, is that s 2 (5) does not lay down two separate requirements at all. A clue to the true meaning of the subsection can be discovered from comparison with s 3 (6) which provides:

‘References in this section to the parties . . . living with each other shall be construed as references to their living with each other in the same household.’

- It is plain that in that subsection the words ‘in the same household’ are words of limitation. Not all living with each other is sufficient for the purposes of s 3 (6), only living with each other in the same household. And in my view the same applies to s 2 (5). What it means is that the husband and wife can be treated as living apart, even if they are living with each other, unless that living with each other is in the same household. It follows that in my judgment the draftsman of s 2 (5) was not providing for a case where parties live in the same household but do not live with each other. Indeed I do not think that there is such a case. In my view, the test
- h to be applied to determine whether parties are living apart or not is unaltered by s 2 (5) or s 3 (6), which are really declaratory of the existing law on this question. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that it is not proved that these spouses were living apart between November 1969 and May 1971. On the contrary I think that during that period they were living with each other in the same household. The fact that they did this from the wholly admirable motive of caring properly
- j for their children cannot change the result of what they did.

Before concluding I should add that I have been greatly assisted by the arguments of both the learned counsel who addressed me and if I have not referred specifically to the arguments based on the cases decided in the Dominion courts, that does not mean that I did not carefully consider their arguments. My only complaint about the two learned counsel would be that they were on the same side; indeed had they been against one another, it would perhaps have been possible to have had an even more careful analysis of the problem from them.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

DAVIES, KARMINSKI AND ROSKILL LJJ

28th OCTOBER 1971

Nullity – Wilful refusal to consummate marriage – Refusal to arrange religious ceremony – Marriage at register office – Mutual intention to hold subsequent religious ceremony – Parties being Sikhs knowing that consummation could only follow religious ceremony – Refusal by husband to arrange ceremony – Refusal constituting wilful refusal to consummate.

The parties who were Sikhs were married at a register office. The marriage had been arranged between the wife's brothers and her father on the one hand and the respondent husband on the other. In order fully to marry according to the Sikh religion and practice it was necessary to have not only a civil ceremony in a register office but also a Sikh ceremony in a Sikh temple. This was understood by all the parties concerned. After the ceremony the wife returned to the home of one of her brothers and the marriage was not consummated. It was the husband's duty to arrange the Sikh ceremony. The wife's brothers on a number of occasions approached the husband and asked him what he proposed to do about the religious ceremony. The husband gave various excuses until eventually he told the wife's brothers that he had no intention of arranging for the religious ceremony at all. The husband had never tried to persuade the wife to have sexual intercourse with him. The wife sought a decree of nullity on the ground of wilful refusal by the husband to consummate the marriage.

Held – The wife was entitled to a decree of nullity because from the time of the ceremony at the register office the husband had entirely refused and failed to implement the marriage and in failing to implement the marriage he had wilfully failed to consummate it (see p 295 c d and h, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by the wife, Surrindjit Kaur, from a judgment of his Honour Judge Lind-Smith given at Coventry County Court on 10th March 1971 refusing her petition for a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of alleged wilful refusal

- a by the husband, Gian Singh, to consummate it. The facts are set out in the judgment of Davies LJ.

P J Cox QC and R J Toyn for the wife.

The husband did not appear and was not represented.

- b DAVIES LJ. This is an appeal by a petitioning wife from a judgment of his Honour Judge Lind-Smith given at the Coventry County Court on 10th March 1971. He had before him a petition by the wife (as I shall call her), who was a Sikh, for a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of the alleged wilful refusal by the husband to consummate it. The learned judge heard the evidence on 27th January and then adjourned in, as it were, the middle of the hearing because he had expressed the view that perhaps this case and another similar one (the facts of which we do not know) presented some difficulty and might be thought to be better dealt with by a judge of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division. However, on consideration, he thought that in the circumstances he had no jurisdiction to transfer, because he had heard the evidence, and he therefore proceeded to judgment on 10th March, dismissing the wife's petition.

- d The facts are in very short compass indeed. The husband had been living in this country for some seven to ten years prior to the events in question. He was, of course, a Sikh too. He was a student at, I think, Surrey University, where he met one of the brothers of the wife. The wife up to then had lived all her life in the Punjab, where she had been born. Eventually it was arranged between the brothers and, I think, the father of the wife, on the one hand, and the respondent husband on the other that he should marry the wife. There was apparently an engagement party held some time in the spring of 1968. On 30th November 1968 the wife arrived at London Airport and was met by, among others, the husband, and I dare say the brothers were there too. She had never seen the husband before but apparently they had corresponded to some extent between the time of the engagement party and her arrival at Heathrow. Having arrived, she went with one of her brothers to Leamington, where he was living. The husband continued to live in Shepherd's Bush. On 15th February 1969 they went through a ceremony of marriage at the Hammersmith Register Office, their respective ages then being, the husband 30 and the wife 22. That evening the wife went back with her brother to Leamington. She has not seen the husband from that day to this.

- g It is beyond question that in order fully to marry according to Sikh religion and practice it is necessary to have not only a civil ceremony in a register office but also a Sikh religious ceremony in a Sikh temple. It was the belief of all these parties, the wife and the brothers, and no doubt the husband as well, that they should in due course go through this Sikh ceremony. Indeed one of the brothers did at some time make tentative arrangements with, I think it is called, the committee of the Sikh temple for a religious ceremony to take place. No sign of any step by the husband in that behalf was forthcoming, and so the brother or brothers on a number of occasions approached him and asked him what he was proposing to do about this religious ceremony. He gave various excuses. On one occasion he said that he had got tonsillitis and was ill for a fortnight or so. On another occasion he said that he could not really deal with the matter at that particular time because he was engaged in writing a thesis for a doctor of philosophy degree and that he could not consider the matter while that was in hand. He failed, he apparently told one of the brothers, in his examination to get his degree. To put it quite shortly, on every occasion when one of the brothers spoke to him he gave one excuse or another. Finally he told them that he had no intention of arranging for the religious ceremony at all. As I have said, since the day of the wedding ceremony at the register office the husband and wife have never met at all.

Those are the facts. The judge was in no doubt as to the sincerity of the wife. He said he had doubts about the sincerity of the two brothers. What he meant by that I do not quite know and how it is relevant I do not know, for there is no doubt that they did approach the husband on more than one occasion. Then the judge goes on:

'There is no doubt in this case in respect of the [wife] that she regarded it as entirely wrong that she should live with her husband before the Sikh ceremony and in that I find the [wife] was entirely sincere . . . The marriage being spoken of [i.e. which was asked to be declared null] of course must be that in the Register Office, but according to the evidence, and I accept it, the [wife] did not expect or would not have allowed—a severe problem, no doubt, according to her view—sexual intercourse to take place: it is difficult to see, in my mind, how it could be said to be wilful refusal by the [husband]. I have no doubt at all of the sincerity of the [wife] in her views, but I have the gravest doubts, as I have said, about the sincerity of the [husband] in his views, because he evinced reluctance to arrange a Sikh ceremony immediately after the Register Office ceremony had been completed, and never did he give any sort of ground for failing to arrange a Sikh ceremony. I think I ought to add here a further finding of fact, that it appears to be the duty of the man to arrange for the Sikh ceremony.'

I confess that I find that passage a little difficult to understand. There was no evidence here of any approach by the husband to the wife, no evidence that the wife was refusing, on a sincere religious belief or at all, to have intercourse with him before a religious ceremony was performed. The naked facts were that he never went near her again, as I have said, and never tried to persuade her to live with him and have intercourse with him. It may very well be true that if he had made any such approach she, according to her religious beliefs, might have said that she was unwilling to allow it before the ceremony. But that never happened.

The learned judge had cited to him *Jodla v Jodla (otherwise Czarnomska)*¹, a decision of Hewson J. The learned county court judge managed—I am not quite sure how, I say with respect—to distinguish that case. For my part, I think it is indistinguishable. Indeed, I think that the present case is a stronger case than *Jodla v Jodla (otherwise Czarnomska)*¹. What happened in *Jodla v Jodla (otherwise Czarnomska)*¹ was this. The two parties were Poles and the woman was having to be sent back to Poland because her visa was going to expire; so in order that she should be able legally to remain in this country the parties, who were both Roman Catholics, went through a register office ceremony. The parties intended that thereafter they should be properly married according to the rites of their church. They never were. The husband, according to his evidence, was asked several times by the wife to make arrangements for the Catholic ceremony, but he failed to do so. They kept in contact, and on one occasion she rebuked him for not arranging the ceremony. I quote from the statement of the facts:

'... early in January, 1958, when the husband complained to the wife that she was not looking after him as a wife should, she replied that he had not arranged the church ceremony so that they could live together. Thereafter the parties drifted apart.'

There you have a case where the wife, consequent on the default by her husband, was refusing to live with him until he corrected that default and arranged the ceremony. Hewson J¹ took the view that that did not amount to wilful refusal by the wife, because she had a legitimate and proper excuse in the circumstances, and that it was the husband's conduct in failing to arrange the religious ceremony that resulted in the non-consummation of the marriage.

a As I have said, I think that this case is a stronger case than that, and I am unable to accept, and indeed if I may say so without disrespect, I do not entirely understand the distinction which the learned judge here sought to draw between that case and this one. I refer to where he said in his judgment:

b 'Eventually Hewson J² was able to arrive at the conclusion that the refusal of the husband to arrange a further ceremony so put it out of his power to have sexual intercourse with the wife and accordingly he was able to grant the wife a decree. I cannot think that Hewson J would have found the same if there had been no evidence that the parties had tried to live together in the sense of making a home together. I think it is very different where the husband has actually been in a position to complain to the wife that she has not been looking after him as a wife should, and then they have drifted apart.'

c I cannot understand that distinction. The facts of this case, to my way of thinking, are as clear as they could be. This husband from the time of the register office ceremony entirely refused and failed to implement the marriage, and in failing to implement the marriage I think it is clear that he wilfully failed to consummate it. I would allow this appeal and grant the wife a decree.

d KARMINSKI LJ. I agree with the judgment of Davies LJ and would venture to emphasise what he has said about the error of the learned judge below in the passage Davies LJ has read from the judgment. It is clear from that passage that the learned judge below misdirected himself both on the facts and on the law. If in this case the learned judge had availed himself of the provisions of s 6 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, I think it is at least possible that he would have avoided that particular error. That section allows the court to ask for help by way of argument before the court from counsel instructed under the direction of the Attorney-General on any question in relation to the matter which the court deems it necessary or expedient to have fully argued. That is a provision which is obviously of great help to the court when, as here, only one side is before the court. I hasten to add that what I am saying e is not in the slightest degree disrespectful to the argument below of junior counsel for the wife, who put the matter fully, and obviously with great care and skill, before the learned county court judge. But the effect of that section is to let the court be quite certain that all the relevant facts and all the relevant authorities are put before it by a skilled and wholly neutral source. Speaking from my own experience I would say at once that in the past I have had very great help in difficult cases from the arguments of counsel instructed by the Queen's Proctor at the request of the court. I have called attention to s 6 because I have sometimes wondered whether that section f is quite as well known as it perhaps ought to be.

g I agree with Davies LJ that this appeal succeeds and that the wife is entitled to a decree.

h ROSKILL LJ. I agree that this appeal must be allowed for the reasons which have been given by Davies and Karminski LJJ. It seems to me that Jodla v Jodla (otherwise Czarnomska)² is indistinguishable. But, if there be any distinction to be made between this case and Jodla's case², it is a distinction which on the facts leads inexorably to the result that the present is a stronger case.

CHANCERY DIVISION

BRIGHTMAN J

19th, 22nd NOVEMBER 1971

Lien – Vendor's lien – Specific performance – Preservation of lien – Purchase of shares – Transfer of shares conditional on payment of purchase price – Calculation of purchase price in accordance with prescribed formula – Calculation not possible until future date – Vendor agreeing to execute transfer of shares in company to plaintiffs forthwith on termination of his employment with company – Price payable to be determined by valuation from company's accounts for two years following date of transfer – Whether plaintiffs entitled to order to execute transfer in advance of payment of purchase price.

The two plaintiff companies entered into an agreement in 1966 to employ the defendant as managing director, he being granted an option to purchase a certain proportion of the companies' shares. The defendant exercised this option and purchased shares in one of the companies. The agreement was subject to determination by either side at six months' notice; under the agreement the defendant undertook that, in the event of the termination of his employment for any reason, he would execute instruments of transfer in respect of shares held by him in the companies and deliver them to the third and fourth plaintiffs. The agreement further provided that 'the consideration payable to [the defendant] shall be for each share so transferred the prescribed price' which was to be calculated from sums appearing in the company's books of account and including inter alia a sum equal to the average of the annual net profit or loss contained 'in the Accounts of the Company approved and signed by two of its directors certified by its auditors and adopted by such Company at the two Annual General Meetings which immediately succeed the date of the transfer'. On 30th September 1970 the defendant's contract of service ended in consequence of a notice served by him. By a letter of 11th November the defendant was required to transfer the shares to the third and fourth plaintiffs in accordance with the agreement and it was intimated that the purchase money would be paid when the price had been calculated after the two accounting years ending 30th June 1972 had expired. The defendant refused to transfer the shares until he had been paid. The plaintiffs sought an order for specific performance in effect requiring the defendant to execute a transfer of the shares and deliver it with the relevant certificates to the third and fourth plaintiffs.

Held – Although under the contract the purchase money was not payable until a future date, the transfer of the shares was conditional on the payment of the purchase price, there being no separate covenant or security for it; accordingly, should the defendant transfer his shares in accordance with the agreement in advance of the calculation and payment of the purchase price he would be entitled in equity to an unpaid vendor's lien on the shares so transferred; in the circumstances the court ought not to grant the equitable relief of specific performance unless the order sought effectively safeguarded the defendant's equitable lien; since it failed to do this the order in the terms sought would be refused (see p 300 d e and h to p 301 a and c, post).

d Procedure summons

- By a writ issued on 16th February 1971 the plaintiffs, Langen & Wind Ltd, Bell Partners Ltd, Nicholas Langen and Gerald Wind, sought specific performance of two contracts in writing between the plaintiffs and the defendant, Simon Bell, dated 24th June 1965 and 6th January 1966. By summons dated 15th April 1971 the plaintiffs applied, inter alia, for an order pursuant to RSC Ord 86 for specific performance of the two contracts. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- e* M H Potter for the plaintiffs.
H M Boyd for the defendant.

- f* BRIGHTMAN J. The summons before me raises a short but not altogether easy point and one that in the experience of counsel before me seems to be without any direct guidance from the authorities. The action is a purchaser's action for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of shares. Under the terms of the contract it is not possible to calculate the exact purchase price until at earliest the second half of 1972. The plaintiffs seek an order for specific performance under which the defendant will be required to transfer the shares into the unincumbered ownership of the purchasers forthwith. The defendant objects to parting with the shares until he has been paid.

- g* There are four plaintiffs: the first is an English company, Langen & Wind Ltd, called in the contract 'the sales company'; the second is Bell Partners Ltd, also an English company and called 'the production company'; the third and fourth plaintiffs are Mr Nicholas Langen and Mr Gerald Wind, both of whom are resident in the United States of America. The defendant is Mr Simon Bell, who lives in this country.

- h* The agreement containing the contract of sale was dated 24th June 1965. It was expressed to be made between the sales company of the first part, the production company of the second part, Mr Langen and Mr Wind of the third and fourth parts and Mr Bell, the defendant, of the fifth part. Under cl 1 and 2 the production company agreed to employ Mr Bell as managing director until mid-1970, and thereafter until determination by either side on six months' notice. Clause 8 gave Mr Bell an option to acquire by subscription or purchase a certain proportion of the shares of the production company and of the sales company. He exercised that option to the extent of 1,000 shares in the production company. I am not certain whether or not he also exercised it in respect of the shares in the sales company, but those shares are not the subject of the summons before me, and I need not consider them. Clause 17 provided as follows:

'(a) In the event of the termination of [the defendant's] employment hereunder for any reason whatsoever [the defendant] shall forthwith and upon demand execute Instruments of Transfer in respect of all the shares then held by [the defendant] in the Production Company and the Sales Company to Mr. Langen and Mr. Wind in equal shares or as they may direct and deliver the same together with all share certificates in respect thereof to Mr. Langen and Mr. Wind or as they may direct (b) In respect of shares so transferred as above the consideration payable to [the defendant] shall be for each share so transferred the prescribed price calculated as mentioned in sub-clause (c) of this clause (c) THE "prescribed price" shall mean the sum per share produced by adding together in the case of the Production Company or the Sales Company (as the case may be):—(i) the nominal amount of the equity share capital (as defined in Section 154 of the Companies Act 1948) of such Company (ii) the aggregate amount of all the capital and reserves of such Company (other than any reserve for future taxation) and including therein such amount as stands to the credit or debit of Profit and Loss Account and (iii) a sum equal to the average of the annual net profit or loss (before taxation but after making all other necessary provisions) as contained in the Accounts of the Company approved and signed by two of its directors certified by its auditors and adopted by such Company at the two Annual General Meetings which immediately succeed the date of the transfer and by dividing the resulting sum by the aggregate number of issued shares in the capital of the Production Company or the Sales Company (as the case may be) (d) ANY price calculated in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this Clause shall be certified by the Auditors for the time being of the Production Company or the Sales Company (as the case may be) who in so certifying shall be deemed to be acting as experts and not as arbitrators.'

By a supplemental agreement dated 6th January 1966, the agreement was formally adopted by the production company, which was in fact incorporated after the date of this principal agreement, and therefore had not executed the same.

On 30th September 1970 the defendant's contract of service ended in consequence of a notice served by him. By a letter of 11th November 1970 the defendant was required to transfer the shares to Mr Langen and Mr Wood in accordance with cl 17 of the agreement. It was intimated that payment would be made after the purchase consideration had been calculated; and that such calculation could not be made until the two accounting years ending 30th June 1972 had expired, and the accounts for those two years had been made up, audited and adopted at annual general meetings. The defendant declined to transfer the shares until he had been paid.

A writ for specific performance was issued on 16th February 1971 and in April a summons under RSC Ord 86 was taken out for specific performance of the contract. The minutes of the order to which the plaintiffs claimed to be entitled are in this form; first of all a declaration that the contract ought to be specifically performed and carried into execution, then an enquiry as to any damage sustained by reason of any delay, and then this paragraph:

'It appearing that the defendant is a party to the said contracts and was appointed managing director of the [production company] thereunder and his said appointment having determined upon September 30, 1970 and the defendant being the registered owner of 1,000 ordinary shares in the [production company] issued on May 10, 1966 and the plaintiffs having demanded of the defendant that he execute an instrument of transfer in respect of the said shares, let the defendant execute the said instrument of transfer and deliver the same together with the share certificate in respect of the said shares to the [production company] within 14 days.'

- a So that the order for specific performance which is sought is really nothing more than a mandatory order on the defendant to execute a transfer and hand it over together with the share certificates.

The plaintiffs' argument is that cl 17 of the principal agreement is perfectly clear; that it requires on the part of the vendor an immediate execution of a transfer and an immediate delivery of the share certificates; and on the plaintiffs' part a deferred

- b payment of the whole of the purchase price. Therefore, it is said, the plaintiffs can come to court for specific performance of the only part of the agreement which is at present ripe for performance.

Counsel for the plaintiffs accepted the general principle which appears in *Fry on Specific Performance*¹:

- c 'It is, as we have already seen, a principle of the court, that it will not compel specific performance of executory contracts unless it can at the time execute the whole contract on both sides.'

But this, counsel said, is subject to an exception²:

- d 'It is hardly needful to repeat that the principle will not apply to contracts which, though they may be entire and single in themselves, contemplate a separate and piecemeal performance of separate parts. There, in the absence of other objection, the court will carry into effect the intention of the parties.'

This contract, it was said, falls within that exception.

- e Specific performance is an equitable remedy, granted on equitable principles. In considering whether to grant that remedy in a case such as the present, a court administering equity ought in my judgment to have regard to another equitable principle, namely that in equity an unpaid vendor is entitled to a lien on the subject-matter of the sale, although he has parted with possession of the subject-matter, and although under the contract the purchase money is not payable until a future date, unless the parties have expressly or by implication excluded such a lien.

- f So far as future instalments of the purchase money are concerned it seems to me quite clear on authority that the equitable lien of the unpaid vendor applies in respect of such instalments. I refer to *Nives v Nives*³, where Fry J made the following order in a vendor's specific performance action:

'Declare the Plaintiff entitled to specific performance of the agreement, and to a lien on the leasehold interest of the Plaintiff for the entirety of the unpaid purchase-money and future instalments . . .'

- g It is not necessary for me to cite any authority—because it is not disputed, and rightly so, by counsel—that the equitable lien for unpaid purchase money is not lost by parting with possession.

It will be convenient to read a brief passage from the judgment of Sir James Bacon V-C in *Re Albert Life Assurance Co, ex parte Western Life Assurance Society*⁴:

- h 'Now, although the rule of law upon which the doctrine of an unpaid vendor's lien depends must be very frequently influenced by the particular circumstances of each case in which it is said to arise, there is one plain principle which guides and governs its application in all cases. If it be expressed, or can be safely and properly inferred from documentary or other evidence, or from the nature of the contract, that it was the intention of the parties that the sale or transfer, however absolute in its terms, was subject to the condition that the purchase-money should be paid, or that the thing contracted to be done by the vendee should be performed, the lien will prevail. If, on the other hand, no such inference can be properly drawn—if the performance of the thing contracted to be done by the vendee was not the condition upon which the transfer was made, but the engagement to do the thing was the consideration for the transfer, the vendor, having accepted that engagement, has the very thing he bargained for, and cannot say that the consideration has not passed to him. In such cases the lien cannot prevail. The rule I have mentioned and its application cannot be more pointedly illustrated nor more clearly expressed than in the judgment of Lord Cranworth in *Dixon v. Gayfrere*⁵.

The same principle is established by *Parrott v Sweetland*⁶ and *Clarke v Royle*⁷ and Lord St Leonards⁸ in commenting on the latter case states:

'There is a marked distinction between a conveyance as for money paid, with a separate security for the price, whether by covenant, bond, or note, and a conveyance expressed to be in consideration of a covenant which the purchaser enters into by the deed itself.'

In the case before me there is no separate covenant or security for the purchase price. There was not in express terms any covenant at all for the payment of the purchase price, nor even any express identification of those who were to pay it. All that the agreement says is that 'the consideration payable to [the defendant] . . . for each share so transferred' shall be so much. Therefore it seems to me that the parties have not by their contract purported to exclude the lien which prima facie, as it seems to me, arises in the case of a vendor who has not (either under the terms of the contract or in the events which have happened) been paid the full purchase price.

I think it right that I should add—although this again is common ground between the parties—that an unpaid vendor's lien extends not only to land but to all property over which a court of equity will assume jurisdiction in the case of a contract of sale; see for example Re Stucley, *Stucley v Kekewich*⁹. I therefore reach the conclusion that if and when the defendant transfers his shares to Mr Langen and Mr Wind in accordance with the terms of cl 17 of the principal agreement in advance of the calculation and payment of the purchase price he will be entitled in equity to a lien on the shares so transferred.

Now here, I think, a difficulty is encountered. If the lien arose in the case of a sale of land there would be no problem. If the land were registered, no doubt a caution could be put on the register to protect the lien; if unregistered, no doubt there is a comparable notice which could be entered in the land charges register. But in the case of an unincorporated company such as the production company, it will not be possible to require the company to accept notice of the lien. So clearly, although in my judgment the lien exists, it can quite easily be lost, because someone may purchase the shares from Mr Langen or Mr Wind without notice of the existence of the lien, or otherwise in circumstances which override the lien.

The question I have to determine is whether a court of equity ought to require some effective steps to be taken to preserve the lien as a term on which the court is prepared to grant specific performance. Having regard to the fact that specific performance is an equitable remedy and to some extent discretionary—although of course that discretion can only be exercised along well-established lines—it seems to me equitable that the court should impose a term which will protect this other equity. In my judgment in circumstances such as arise in the case before me a court of equity ought not to grant the equitable relief of specific performance unless

- a the order sought will effectively safeguard the unpaid vendor's equitable lien for his purchase money.

Now the order which I am asked to make on the summons and the minutes of order is one which neither seeks to preserve such lien nor even acknowledges its existence. At the start of the case I asked counsel for the plaintiffs whether he was able, on behalf of the plaintiffs, to offer any charge on the shares or security of any type for the unpaid purchase money. He told me that Mr Langen and Mr Wind were not in this country, that there was a difficulty in communicating with them, and that his instructions did not extend to offering any such security. I am not sure whether, on this second day of the hearing, the plaintiffs' counsel may not now have wider authority than on the first day, but he tells me that he primarily seeks an order in the terms of the minutes which have been placed before the court; and that he desires a decision whether he is entitled to that order, before, as a second best, any question of security arises. For the reasons I have given I conclude that on the facts of the present case, and applying principles of equity, the plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief which is sought by the summons in its present form, but I will give the plaintiffs' counsel an opportunity to apply to me for leave to amend the summons if he so wishes, and in case any such application is made to offer proper security, should that arise.

h The appellant served a notice on the respondent highway authority under s 59 (2)^a of the Highways Act 1959, requiring them to state whether or not they admitted that a certain piece of road was highway maintainable at the public expense. The respondents did not make the appropriate admission and accordingly the appellant brought proceedings in quarter sessions for an order that the highway be maintained by the respondents. The road in question was some two miles long and for some 600 yards formed the only means of vehicular access to the appellant's premises. At the hearing the justices found in the appellant's favour that the road was a highway repairable at the public expense. They decided, however, to make no order as to costs on the grounds that the work of making up the road would involve great expense, most if not all of little value to the public, and that the success of the application meant a Section 59 (2), so far as material, provides: 'A person . . . who alleges that a way . . . (a) is a highway maintainable at the public expense . . . and (b) is out of repair, may serve a notice on the highway authority or other person alleged to be liable to maintain the way . . . (in this . . . section referred to as "the respondent") requiring the respondent to state whether he admits that the way . . . is a highway and that he is liable to maintain it.'

that a substantial and uncovenanted advantage accrued to the appellant; they concluded by observing that it was possible that the public highway might nevertheless be stoppeed up under other provisions of the 1959 Act. a

Held – Although in cases where a successful complainant in civil proceedings before quarter sessions was merely acting as a member of the public, it was possible that the court might have some discretion to deprive him of his costs on the footing that the public themselves had not benefited adequately out of the bringing of the proceedings in the present case the appellant was not just a member of the public but had in fact a proprietary right which was directly affected by the outcome of the proceedings; accordingly the ordinary rule in civil proceedings, that costs followed the event, prima facie applied and, in the absence of any adequate reason for depriving him of his costs, an award should be made in his favour (see p 305 c and f to j, post). b

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county of Hereford in respect of their adjudication sitting as quarter sessions on 23rd and 24th November 1970. The appellant, Patrick Hugh Riggall, appeared before the justices as an applicant for an order under s 59 (3) of the Highways Act 1959 that the respondents, Hereford County Council, as the relevant highway authority should put into proper repair within such period as might be specified a certain way known as Croft Lane lying in part in the parish of Yarpole in the county of Hereford for its length between places known as 'The Broad' and 'Barr's Croft'. The appellant contended this way was a highway for all purposes maintainable by the respondents and that it was out of repair. e

On 8th December 1970 the justices delivered their determination in writing in which they found that the relevant part of Croft Lane was a highway for all purposes maintainable by the respondents and that it was out of repair and they ordered the respondents to put the relevant part of Croft Lane into proper repair within a period of 12 months from 1st December 1970. The justices allowed the application and made no order as to the costs of the appellant in making the application. The appellant being dissatisfied with that part of the determination by which no order was made for his costs as being in error in point of law he requested the justices to state a case for the opinion of the High Court and the justices agreed to do so. f

On the hearing of the application the following facts were proved or admitted. The relevant part of Croft Lane had never been maintained by any highway authority in the past. The respondents had consistently denied any obligation to maintain the relevant part of Croft Lane until by a letter dated 2nd October 1970 addressed and sent to the appellant's solicitors they admitted that the relevant part of Croft Lane was a public bridleway. The relevant part of Croft Lane was manifestly out of repair but such disrepair with regard to the first 1,300 yards of the lane from the Broad, for 600 yards of its length from the appellant's farm to the Riddle and for 800 yards north of the Riddle was the result of many years of disuse. The appellant purchased his farm known as Lypiatts Farm (formerly Cabbage Hall) in 1969. g a event of the appellant succeeding in showing that the relevant part of Croft Lane was a highway for all purposes maintainable by the respondents, the respondents should be ordered to pay the appellant's costs. It was further contended that if the appellant should fail to do so he should nevertheless be entitled to costs up to 2nd October 1970, the date on which the respondents made the admission by letter that the relevant part of Croft Lane was a public bridleway.

b It was contended for the respondents on the question of costs at the hearing that in the event of the respondents succeeding the appellant should be ordered to pay the respondents' costs and on the matter of the admission and generally the court had an unfettered discretion about costs. Reference was made to s 60 (1) (d) of the Highways Act 1959.

c On reserving their determination the deputy chairman of the justices indicated that he was disposed, subject to anything his fellow justices might hold, to award costs of the day of the hearing to the side which substantially succeeded subject to a possibility (which was doubted) that some allowance might be made for those costs incurred as a result of a failure to admit that which had been subsequently admitted.

d On the facts stated above the justices came to the following conclusions with regard to the question of costs. The work of making up the relevant part of Croft Lane would involve great expense most if not all of which would be of no value to the public. The success of the application meant that there would accrue to the appellant and possibly others a substantial and uncovenanted advantage and that s 38 (2) (a) of the Highways Act 1959 created this anomalous result. It was not suggested by the appellant that the price he paid for his farm failed to reflect the financial burden of maintaining the length of Croft Lane fronting his farm. It was not suggested by the appellant that he purchased the farm in the belief that the length of Croft Lane leading to it was maintainable at public expense. The application seemed to the justices to lack merit in as much as they would have made no order if they had been empowered to apply s 50 or 108 of the 1959 Act to the way in question. The justices, accordingly, made no order as to the appellant's costs.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the quarter sessions of Hereford, who on the application of the appellant made an order against the respondents, the Hereford County Council, that a certain piece of road known as Croft Lane in that county was a highway maintainable at public expense under s 59 (2) of the Highways Act 1959. No question arises as to the propriety of the quarter sessions' decision that this road was a highway of the kind described. The only question put before us as a question of law is whether or not quarter sessions erred in refusing to make an order for costs in favour of the appellant.

h From that somewhat unpromising material an extremely interesting and quite important debate has resulted, and we would like to thank counsel on both sides for their assistance. The matter can be put quite shortly: under s 59 there is a procedure whereby any person, and I stress the words 'any person', who alleges that a way or bridge is a highway maintainable at public expense may serve notice on the highway authority requiring that authority to state whether or not it admits that the way or bridge in question is a highway, and that it is liable to maintain it.

i The section goes on with further machinery depending in its application on whether the original recipient of the notice does or does not admit the facts alleged. In particular, if the authority on whom the notice is served does not within a specified time agree that the way or bridge in question is a highway and repairable at public expense, then the complainant, who is the man who originally served the notice, may bring proceedings in quarter sessions for an order that the highway be maintained by the highway authority.

All that was done in the present case. The appellant served what is admittedly a proper notice under the section; the highway authority, the respondents, were not prepared to accede to what he had alleged in the notice. Initially the respondents maintained that there was no public highway over the road in question at all, but at a later stage, some month or so before the hearing, the respondents did concede that there was a public bridleway over the road in question, but disputed to the end the claim of the appellant that there was a public right of way for all purposes. In the end, the justices found in favour of the appellant, and in a judgment which is incorporated in the case they review the evidence, and it is really fair to say that the evidence was all one way, and that the ultimate conclusion that this was a highway repairable by the public was not one to be escaped.

Then came the question of costs. The parties had left the matter, when quarter sessions reserved their judgment, with mutual submissions that he who succeeded in the issue should have his costs. But somewhat to the surprise of the appellant, when the justices made a conclusion in his favour, they directed that there should be no order as to costs. Their reasons for making no order have been explored and are set out in detail in the case before us. It is worth observing, in order to understand the reasons, that the road in question was some two miles long and for some 600 yards of it, it formed the only means of vehicular access to the appellant's premises. It was therefore right to say that he had a special interest in the outcome of these proceedings, special and superior to the interests of the ordinary public at large. In deciding not to make an order for costs in his favour, the quarter sessions relied on the following reasons. They stated that:

'The work of making up the relevant part of Croft Lane would involve great expense most if not all of which would be of no value to the public.'

This is clearly reflecting the special interests of the appellant to which I have referred. They go on to say: 'The success of the application meant that there would accrue to the [appellant] and possibly others a substantial and uncovenanted advantage...' and that this anomalous result was created by the provisions of the Highways Act 1959, to which I have referred. They went on:

'It was not suggested by the [appellant] that the price he paid for his farm failed to reflect the financial burden of maintaining the length of Croft Lane fronting his farm. It was not suggested by the [appellant] that he purchased the farm in the belief that the length of Croft Lane leading to it was maintainable at public expense.'

Finally they observed, and I paraphrase their wording here somewhat, that the matter is not finalised by their decision because under other provisions of the Highways Act 1959 it is possible that this public highway, now established as such, may nevertheless be stopped up under machinery contained in the Act, to the details of which I do not refer.

Before us, the argument of counsel for the appellant has been that the reasons given by the justices are reasons on which their conclusions could not properly be based. He says that they are irrelevant considerations not proper to be used in determining this issue, and he says that since this argument, in his submission, applies to all the reasons the justices have given, one must conclude that there are no good reasons to sustain their decision to refuse costs. He asks us to give effect to that argument by making an order for costs in his favour now.

Counsel for the respondents opened an entirely new window on the scene by pointing out that this kind of litigation is not in all respects similar to ordinary party and party litigation. In ordinary civil litigation between parties, counsel would accept the ordinary rule that costs follow the event, but here he says it is not litigation between the appellant as one party and the respondents as another party. The application initiated by the appellant, so the argument goes, is an application on behalf

a of the public and not on behalf of himself and counsel for the respondents argues that in those circumstances it is perfectly open to the quarter sessions to say that in their view the public will gain very little as a result of all that has been done, and inferentially that the costs involved in the proceedings were not really merited by the advantage to the public which would follow. Accordingly, he said, it is open to the justices to say that the public should not be fairly expected to pay the costs of the proceedings when the benefit to them is so minimal and there was here a sufficient reason for the b justices to exercise their discretion in the way in which they did.

I would approach this problem on these lines. In criminal cases any conception that costs follow the event is a very dangerous conception, and one which I would not attempt to encourage. But in the case of purely civil proceedings in quarter sessions, I would have thought the general principle that costs follow the event should
c apply in the same way as it applies in litigation in ordinary civil proceedings in the civil courts.

We were referred to a dictum of Sir George Jessel MR in *Cooper v Whittingham*¹, where he said:

‘As I understand the law as to costs it is this, that where a plaintiff comes to enforce a legal right, and there has been no misconduct on his part—no omission or neglect which would induce the Court to deprive him of his costs—the Court has no discretion, and cannot take away the plaintiff’s right to costs. There may be misconduct of many sorts: for instance, there may be misconduct in commencing the proceedings, or some miscarriage in the procedure, or an oppressive or vexatious mode of conducting the proceedings, or other misconduct which will induce the Court to refuse costs; but where there is nothing of the kind the d rule is plain and well settled, and is as I have stated it.’

For my part I think that that ought to be a general guiding line in regard to costs in the civil jurisdiction of quarter sessions. But I still recognise the argument put forward by counsel for the respondents that there will be cases where the circumstances are such that the litigation is not on a par with ordinary civil litigation inter partes. I f for my part reserve for further consideration on another day the submission made by counsel for the respondents that if the complainant in proceedings such as the present is acting merely as a member of the public, there may well have to be some discretion left in quarter sessions to deprive him of his costs after success, on the footing that he is no more than a member of the public, and the public themselves have not benefited adequately out of the bringing of the proceedings. I would leave that as I say for further and more detailed consideration on another day. But where as here
g the complainant is not just a member of the public but has in fact a proprietary right which is directly affected by the outcome of the proceedings, in those circumstances in my judgment the ordinary rule in regard to costs in civil proceedings should prima facie apply, and in the absence of any adequate reason for depriving such an appellant of his costs, I think it would follow that an award of costs should be made in his
h favour. I accordingly for my part would allow this appeal and order that the costs of the appellant in the court below should be paid by the respondents.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

EDMUND DAVIES AND STEPHENSON LJJ AND WALLER J

2nd, 16th NOVEMBER 1971

Criminal law – Indictment – Joinder – Joint charge of assault occasioning actual bodily harm – One accused acquitted for want of sufficient evidence – Jury told acquittal of one accused no bar to conviction of other accused – Other accused convicted – No evidence of joint action between two accused – Whether evidence of joint action necessary before second accused could be convicted.

The appellant and W were jointly charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm. At the close of the prosecution case the jury were directed to acquit W for want of sufficient evidence. In his summing-up the trial judge directed the jury that the acquittal of W was no bar to a verdict of guilty against the appellant but he made no reference to any need for evidence of joint action between the appellant and W. The appellant was convicted. On appeal the question arose whether, since W had been acquitted, the appellant could be found guilty without some evidence that he had been acting jointly with W.

Held – Where one of two persons jointly charged with an offence was found guilty, a jury could not convict the other without evidence that he had acted jointly with the first, since there would be two offences found where only one was charged. Where, however, the first accused was acquitted of the joint offence, there was no question of the other being found guilty of a second offence and no need for evidence that he had acted jointly; the joint offence disappeared with the acquittal of the first accused and the second accused could be convicted of the offence charged as if he had been charged in a separate court with an independent offence (see p 309 c and d, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Andrew Malcolm Rowlands against his conviction on 7th October 1971 at Oxford City Quarter Sessions before the deputy recorder (I J Black a Esq QC) and a jury of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. He was sentenced to serve three months at a detention centre. He applied for leave to appeal against sentence. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

Cur adv vult

16th November. STEPHENSON LJ read the judgment of the court at the invitation of Edmund Davies LJ. The appellant was tried at Oxford City Quarter Sessions on an indictment containing three counts. On count 1 his brother Roger (Dick) Rowlands was charged with assaulting Lajos Nagy thereby occasioning him actual bodily harm on 23rd July 1971 in the city of Oxford. On that count he was convicted and sentenced by the deputy recorder to 18 months' imprisonment. On count 2 the appellant and a man named Woodward were charged with assaulting Nagy thereby occasioning him actual bodily harm on the same date and at the same place. On the direction of the deputy recorder, the jury acquitted Woodward, but they convicted the appellant and he was sentenced to three months' detention in a detention centre. A third count charged Mr Nagy's wife with maliciously wounding the appellant on the same date and at the same place. She was acquitted.

The appellant appeals against his conviction under s 1 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 on a certificate granted by the deputy recorder on this ground:

e

'[The appellant] and Barry Ronald Edward Woodward were jointly charged in one count of the indictment with an assault occasioning actual bodily harm to Lajos Nagy. I directed the jury to acquit Woodward at the close of the prosecution case for want of sufficient evidence against him. In summing up I directed the jury in the case of [the appellant] that if they came to the conclusion that the charge against him of occasioning Nagy actual bodily harm is proved then it was their duty to convict him of it, and the fact that upon my direction they acquitted Woodward who was charged in the same count is no bar to that verdict. In the course of my summing up I made no reference to any need for there to be evidence that [the appellant] was acting jointly with Woodward.'

f

Counsel for the appellant makes a second point, that the evidence did not establish that any injury suffered by Mr Nagy was inflicted by the appellant and therefore if the appellant was guilty of anything it was of common assault. Counsel for the Crown concedes that this is so and asks us to substitute a verdict of common assault if we decide the point certified against the appellant.

All three counts arose out of incidents on the night of 23rd July 1971. Mr and Mrs Nagy were selling 'hot dogs' from a motor van in the street. Dick Rowlands and the appellant arrived in a car driven by Mr Woodward (who was their brother-in-law); there was a fourth man with them. There was some cause of friction between Dick and Mr Nagy and they got into a fight. The case against the appellant was that he joined in to assist Dick; he claimed that he was never more than a spectator. At some stage the appellant suffered a wound as a result of a blow by Mrs Nagy and this, it was said, so infuriated Dick and the others that they attacked Mr Nagy with considerable ferocity. Mr Nagy said that Dick abused him and then struck him. He grappled with Dick who then butted him in the face. Then others from the car, including the appellant, joined Dick in attacking him. He was, however, not sure that Mr Woodward took part. He went to the ground and suffered a one inch cut over his nose and bruising on his head and body. Mrs Nagy said that she saw the appellant and others attacking her husband. She went to his assistance and punched the appellant. She forgot that she had a kitchen utensil in her hand, and this caused a serious cut on the appellant's throat.

The affair was witnessed by two men called Morris and Bellinger. Mr Morris said he saw Mr Nagy chasing Dick, then there was a cry from the appellant that his throat had been cut and thereafter 'all hell was let loose'. Mr Bellinger said there was a scuffle between Dick and Mr Nagy. Others including the appellant but not Mr Woodward joined in, and Mr Nagy went to the ground. After some fighting he saw that the appellant had a throat wound and after this Dick and others attacked Mr Nagy violently and he was kicked and punched. Dick Rowlands said that Mr Nagy was the aggressor at the outset. He agreed that later someone kicked Mr Nagy; he would not, or could not, say who it was. He said that after the appellant was hurt his only concern was to take him to hospital. He made a statement to the police in which he appeared to take sole responsibility for Mr Nagy's injuries. The appellant said that he only watched whilst Dick and Mr Nagy struggled. A man called Sparks joined in and kicked Mr Nagy. Then Mrs Nagy attacked him. At the hospital he at first told the doctor that he had got his injury by walking into a lamp-post. In a statement to the police he denied attacking Mr Nagy.

Counsel for the appellant does not now contend that the acquittal of Mr Woodward on count 2 is a bar to the conviction of the appellant on the same count. But he submits that once Mr Woodward was acquitted, the jury could not find the appellant guilty without some evidence that he was acting jointly with Mr Woodward in assaulting Mr Nagy, and as there was no such evidence of joint action the jury should have been directed to acquit him too. Counsel for the Crown concedes that there was no evidence of joint action with Mr Woodward, but says that there need not be.

If the submission made on behalf of the appellant is right, the results are startling. Take the case of two men indicted for burglary in one count, one as the person actively entering the premises as a trespasser, the other as the look-out man, together concerned in a joint enterprise. If the jury acquit the look-out man because they think that his explanation that he was waiting outside the premises for some innocent purpose may be true, the burglar caught red-handed inside must usually be acquitted. For the verdict that the look-out man is not guilty must negative any evidence of a common plan of concerted action between the two of them except where there is some evidence against the actual burglar which is not evidence against the look-out, such as an admission to the police by the burglar that there was such a plan of action. To avoid that injustice in many cases the two of them must be indicted in separate counts. Is there any principle or authority which forces such a surprising conclusion on criminal courts?

It is suggested that authority is to be found in the cases of *R v Scaramanga*¹, *R v Parker*² and *R v Merriman*³. An examination of those authorities has convinced us that they do not support, let alone compel, any such conclusion. What those cases establish is that where two persons are jointly charged in one count with one offence (and the use of the word 'jointly' or 'together' is not necessary to make the offence charged in the count a joint offence), and one of them is convicted whether by verdict (*R v Scaramanga*¹) or on his own confession (*R v Parker*²), the other cannot be convicted of a second and independent offence, whether a separate act of malicious damage (*R v Scaramanga*¹) or an independent theft (*R v Parker*²) or an independent wounding (*R v Merriman*³)—but only of taking part in the joint offence charged against both and proved against one.

We have considered with care the language of Donaldson J in giving the judgment of this court in *R v Parker*⁴ where he said:

'It is clear law that if a person is accused of stealing two articles, he can be

1 [1963] 2 All ER 852, [1963] 2 QB 807

2 [1969] 2 All ER 15, [1969] 2 QB 248

3 [1971] 2 All ER 1424, [1971] 2 WLR 1453

a convicted if it be proved that he stole one only. It is also clear that if two persons are accused of stealing jointly one or other or both may be convicted of that joint stealing. Alternatively either, but not both could be convicted of stealing independently . . . In each of these cases the essential feature is that one offence is charged and one offence is proved. *R. v. Scaramanga*⁵ and the other decisions therein cited all proceed on the basis that in the absence of statutory provisions, such as s. 44 (5) of the Larceny Act 1916, if only one offence is charged it is not open to the court or jury to find two offences proved. In the present case the verdict of the jury is at least capable of the interpretation that a different offence was committed by the appellant from that to which Miss Overy pleaded guilty. Only one offence was charged and it was not open to the jury to find that a second offence was committed.'

c We accept counsel for the Crown's submission that where one of two persons jointly charged with one offence is guilty, it is not open to a jury to convict the other without evidence that he acted jointly with the first because otherwise there would be two offences found when only one was charged; but that where the first accused is found not guilty of the joint offence charged there is no question of the other being found guilty of a second offence and no need for evidence that he acted jointly. In our view the joint offence has gone with the passing of the first accused from the case and the second can be convicted of the offence charged as if he had been charged in a separate count with an independent offence.

d If Mr Woodward had been found guilty on this indictment, we should have felt bound to follow the earlier decisions to which we have referred. But we endorse the view of this court in *R v Merriman*⁶ that the position which they establish calls for further consideration either by legislature or by another court and we have no wish to extend them to cases like the present case which they do not govern. As stated in the passage of the judgment in *R v Parker*⁷ already cited, 'either but not both could be convicted of stealing independently', and the first of those two results is what has happened here: the appellant has been convicted of an independent assault after the acquittal of Mr Woodward accused with him of a joint assault.

e It is conceded that the appellant's assault was a common assault only. We therefore, instead of allowing or dismissing this appeal, substitute for the verdict found by the jury a verdict of guilty of common assault in the exercise of the court's powers under s 3 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968. We then have to consider whether on the application for leave to appeal against sentence we should pass such sentence in substitution for the sentence passed at the trial as may be authorised by law for the offence of common assault.

g In considering this application we take into account, as did the deputy recorder, that the appellant was only 17 at the time, five years younger than his brother, that his part in the attack on Mr Nagy was not as great as his brother's and that he had suffered substantially by having his throat seriously cut. There was also before the deputy recorder, as there is before us, the probation officer's opinion expressing doubts about probation or a financial penalty, and the appellant's record of two offences, both apparently committed shortly before this offence. On 1st June 1971 he had been bound over in the sum of £25 for 12 months for threatening behaviour, and on 2nd August for assaulting a police officer he was fined £10. The deputy recorder made no order forfeiting the £25, but ordered him to go to a detention centre for three months. This court does not see how any other or lesser punishment could meet this offence of common assault in all the circumstances, and this application for leave to appeal against sentence is refused.

LORD WIDGERY CJ, BROWNE AND BRIDGE JJ c

Licensing – Permitted hours – Exemption – Special order of exemption – Special occasion – Club premises – Premises licensed for persons attending social functions held by outside bodies – Application for special order of exemption in respect of function held by outside body – Refusal on ground that function not a special occasion for club members – Character of body holding function not in itself determining whether function special occasion or not – Licensing Act 1964, s 74 (4). d

The applicant, the secretary of a club, held a justices' on-licence for the ground floor and basement of the club premises which restricted the sale of intoxicating liquor to members of the club, bona fide guests of such members and to persons attending a dinner-dance reception or other similar social function. This latter restriction was intended to reflect the facility whereby the large hall on the ground floor of the premises could be hired to outside organisations for a function which they proposed to hold. The club wished to hire the hall for a plumbers' dinner and the applicant made an application under s 74 (4)^a of the Licensing Act 1964 to the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis for a special order of exemption. The commissioner refused to grant the order on the ground that the holding of the plumbers' dinner was not a special occasion for the members of the club in respect of which the licence had been granted. e

Held – The reason given by the commissioner for refusing the order was an irrelevant reason because the character of the body holding the function did not in itself determine whether the function was a special occasion or not. Whether an occasion was special or not did not depend on whether the body organising the function was the club itself or an outside body. As the reason given for refusing the order was the only reason put forward by the commissioner for his decision, his discretion had not been validly exercised and, therefore, the matter should be sent back to him to consider the application on relevant and admissible grounds (see p 313 b to d and h, post). g

Per Curiam. The fact that a wide variety of different organisations use club premises week after week would not itself make each occasion a special occasion if similar activity on the part of the club itself would lose the quality of being special (see p 313 f and h, post). h a This was an application by Anthony Joseph Ruxton for an order of mandamus directed to the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis requiring him to hear and determine according to law an application for a special order of exemption made under s 74 (4) (a) of the Licensing Act 1964 in respect of premises known as Catholic Association of Social Activities Club situated at Oxlow Lane, Dagenham, in the London borough of Barking. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

Motion for mandamus

b D W T Price for the applicant.

D H Spencer for the commissioner.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of the applicant, who is the holder of a justices' on-licence for the ground floor and basement of premises known as Catholic Association of Social Activities Club which is situated in Oxlow Lane, Dagenham. He applies for an order of mandamus directed to the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis requiring him to hear and determine according to law an application for a special order of exemption made under s 74 (4) (a) of the Licensing Act 1964. The special order of exemption is sought in respect of tomorrow, 13th November 1971, and is in respect of a function organised by a local organisation of plumbers. Section 74 (4) provides:

'Justices of the peace may—(a) on an application by the holder of a justices' on-licence for any premises, or (b) on an application by the secretary of a club registered in respect of any premises, make an order (in this Act referred to as a special order of exemption) adding such hours as may be specified in the order to the permitted hours in those premises on such special occasion or occasions as may be so specified.'

In the metropolis that function is exercised not by the justices of the peace but by the Commissioner of Police.

There is a little history which cannot be avoided in leading up to the point which arises before the court today. These premises in Oxlow Lane, Dagenham, which are in their entirety in the ownership of the trustees of the diocese of Brentwood, are in fact on three floors, basement, ground and first floor. There are two justices' licences in force in respect of the premises. The first, which by common consent of the parties is confined to the first floor, is a licence for supply of intoxicating liquor with a condition restricting such supply to, and I only quote the relevant one:

'(a) a member of the said club [in the context that means the Dagenham Catholic Social Club] who has been a member for at least 2 days or whose nomination or application for membership was made at least 2 days before his admission (b) a guest of such a member bona fide entertained by him at his own expense'.

That is no doubt a licence granted under s 55 of the Act, although we take counsel for the applicant's point that it seems now to have got itself on to an inappropriate form. The other licence in the name of the applicant is concerned with the ground floor and basement and is in identical terms except that it refers to a club of a different name, the Catholic Association of Social Activities Club, and the condition restricting the supply of intoxicating liquor extends not only to the conditions of (a) and (b) which I have read from the other licence, but includes at (c) 'a person attending a dinner, dance reception or other similar social function'.

These two licences were originally granted in 1964, and we have an affidavit from Mr Mullis, who was the solicitor concerned with the applications at that time, which shows that it was a matter of deliberate policy to secure two licences for these premises, and to provide further that the licence in respect of the first floor should be restricted by normal club conditions, whereas the licence in respect of the ground floor and basement should be more extensive in that it permitted the supply of intoxicating liquor to a person attending a dinner/dance reception or other similar social functions. It is not for us to enquire what was passing through the minds of the justices in 1964 when these licences were granted, but I for my part am quite ready to accept what Mr Mullis says, that this was deliberately done with the full co-operation of the justices, and, indeed, with the underlying intention that the large hall on the ground floor might conveniently be let out to various local organisations requiring to hold functions, and that if such functions were held by such outside organisations, an extension of the authority to supply liquor would be necessary to cover such functions. It follows, I think, that condition (c), which I have read, in the licence relating to the ground floor and basement was intended to reflect this facility whereby the premises could be hired out to outside organisations for a function which they proposed to hold.

Having got those licences, everything seems to have gone smoothly for a number of years, and it is clear on the evidence that from time to time, indeed perhaps very frequently, when the hall has been hired to an outside organisation, an application for a special order of exemption under s 74 has been made. The police have thought it right to look into the matter more closely in recent months, and the situation has come to a head by reason of the commissioner's decision to refuse a number of applications of this kind, and in particular to refuse the application for the plumbers' dinner tomorrow evening.

The decision letter, it is agreed, in which the commissioner announced his conclusion in regard to tomorrow's function is one dated 16th July 1971; it is signed on behalf of the assistant commissioner; it is written to solicitors acting for the applicant, and it states:

'I am directed by the Commissioner to refer to your letter of 15 June in which you made application on behalf of [the applicant] for a Special Order of Exemption for the above Club on 21 August, and to say that as it is not considered that the occasion you specified would be a special occasion for the members of the Catholic Association of Social Activities Club, in respect of which Association the Justices licence was granted, he feels unable to grant such an Order.'

I draw attention to the fact that the application there referred to was one in respect of 21st August 1971, but it is, I understand, common ground that this letter in effect gives the commissioner's reason for refusing the later application relative to the function tomorrow.

The matter is taken a little further by the affidavit of Mr Stonely, who is a principal working in the department of the metropolitan police which advises the commissioner. I find it unnecessary to go into the detail; he explains how the police have been somewhat concerned at the unusual situation provided in this building where there are two separate justices' licences. He goes on to set out the history in rather more detail than I have given it, and he sets out what I understand to be the commissioner's reasons for refusing the special order for exemption which is in issue before us. It reads as follows:

'The Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police was advised by me that whilst each application had to be considered separately on its merits those that arose from the ordinary regular outside bookings for the use of the premises and were unconnected in any way with the Social Club would with difficulty rate as special occasions meriting Special Orders of Exemption. I have no doubt that for this reason all such applications were refused.'

Counsel for the applicant says that when one looks at all the material which is before us, it becomes clear that the commissioner has refused this special order of exemption because the organisation which is to hold the function, which function is the special occasion in question, is an organisation other than the club itself. It is argued before us that it is not a proper ground for refusing the special order of exemption that the organisation to enjoy the facility, if the order is granted, is an organisation other than a the club itself. Counsel for the applicant argues that this is an extraneous and irrelevant reason, and he draws his argument from the fact that the very form of the justices' licence held in respect of the ground floor and basement contemplates that there shall be functions of this kind, and thus gives the lie, as it were, to the commissioner's argument that special occasions do not extend to occasions from foreign organisations and bodies hiring the hall for a particular day.

b For my part I think that if one confines the argument of counsel for the applicant to the precise circumstances of the present case, he is right. I cannot for my part see that the character of the body holding the function in itself determines whether the function is a special occasion or not. I cannot on the face of it see why an occasion should be more or less special if one can put it that way, according to whether the organisation organising the function was the club itself or an outside body. If it be c the fact, and I feel bound to conclude on the material before us that it was the fact, that this was the only reason put forward by the commissioner for his decision, then in my view that was an irrelevant reason and one on which reliance cannot be placed. It follows from that that in my judgment the commissioner's discretion was never validly exercised, and it is right to send the matter back to him, as it were, with instructions in the form of an order of mandamus that he is to exercise his discretion, d in other words that he is to consider this application on relevant and admissible grounds.

I hasten to say that that by no means secures the function planned for tomorrow evening, because I would not wish anything I have said to obscure the fact that the commissioner has a very wide, and often very difficult, discretion to exercise in these matters. It may well be that the commissioner now or hereafter will take the view e that these functions occur with such frequency that they lose their special character. I am not attempting to say that that is so, but it is a matter which may well appeal to the commissioner. If all these functions were held by the club virtually every Friday and every Saturday night, an argument that they had lost their special quality might well be raised. We had a case¹ only a few weeks ago in this court in which those considerations were debated, and just as I do not see any reason for saying that the f identity of the organisers prevents this from being a special occasion, so it seems to me that the fact that there is a wide variety of different organisers using this club week after week does not in itself make each occasion a special occasion when similar activity on the part of the club itself would lose the quality of being special.

g It is unwise that I should say more, but I am anxious to emphasise that all we ought to do in my judgment is to declare that the single reason apparently relied on is an invalid reason, but to stress the great width of the commissioner's discretion in regard to a variety of other reasons, which I would not seek to canvass. In my judgment the order of mandamus should go on the terms prayed.

BROWNE J. I agree.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

RUSSELL, SACHS AND STAMP LJJ

2nd, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th JULY, 13th OCTOBER 1971

Income tax – Appeal – Appeal against additional assessment – Hearing – Adjournment – Unjustified refusal of adjournment – Effect – Whether ground for rehearing or for discharge of assessment – Assessment under Sch E made in respect of unexplained increase in taxpayer's wealth – Increase alleged by Crown to represent payments from undisclosed profits of private company controlled by taxpayer – Claim by taxpayer that increase arose from betting winnings – Taxpayer too ill to attend hearing and give evidence – Subsequent recovery in health would have enabled him to give evidence at adjourned hearing – Hearing in absence – Assessments affirmed by commissioners – Appeal to High Court – Order for rehearing – Decline in health of taxpayer following High Court decision – Taxpayer's ill-health precluding him from ever giving evidence – Effect of refusal of adjournment to deprive taxpayer of opportunity of ever giving evidence – Whether refusal justifying discharge of assessment.

Income tax – Appeal – Appeal against additional assessment – Hearing – Hearing of separate but connected appeals by different taxpayers simultaneously – Admission by one taxpayer accepted as evidence against other – Appeal by company against additional assessment to profits tax and excess profits tax in relation to alleged undisclosed profits – Appeal by taxpayer controlling company against additional assessments in relation to alleged remuneration from undisclosed profits of company – Application for separate hearings – Imperfectly stated refusal – Counsel for taxpayer and company reasonably understanding that application accepted – Counsel forbearing to submit that figures, calculations etc accepted by taxpayer and evidence by Crown not accepted by or evidence against company – No evidence against company – Discharge of assessment against company.

Income tax – Appeal – Case stated – Order for rehearing by High Court – Order in respect of assessments not in case stated – Assessments dealt with by commissioners but not appealed – Competence – Income Tax Act 1952, s 64 (6).

The taxpayer was the owner of 80 per cent of the shares of the taxpayer company ('the company'), a private company dealing in the purchase and sale of textiles which he personally carried on and of which he, his wife and his son, who each owned 10 per cent of the shares, were the directors. He was assessed to income tax under Sch E to the Income Tax Act 1952 for the years 1942-43 to 1950-51 in respect of remuneration said to have been received by him from the company amounting in total to £65,000 by which his asset position was found to have been improved. The company was simultaneously assessed to profits tax and excess profits tax on the basis that the £65,000 was profits of its trade which did not appear in its accounts and, having been paid out in remuneration, was assessable under the enactments relating to excess directors' remuneration. Both the taxpayer and the company were alternatively assessed to income tax under Sch D on the footing that the taxpayer had acquired the £65,000 from the company so as to remain accountable to it for that sum and therefore the £65,000 was not remuneration but earnings by way of a trade of the taxpayer or profits of the company. The taxpayer and the company appealed to the General Commissioners of Income Tax. At the hearing their counsel applied for an adjournment on the ground that, on medical evidence, the taxpayer was too ill to give evidence in person although his health (as in fact happened) would improve and enable him to do so later. The application was a refused. Counsel also applied for the taxpayer's appeals and the company's appeals to be heard separately. The commissioners again refused but their refusal was stated in such a way that counsel reasonably understood that the application had been granted. Accordingly, on the assumption that only the taxpayer's appeal was being heard he forbore to submit that the evidence of figures and calculations and correspondence accepted by the taxpayer and evidence given by the Crown in his appeal had not been accepted by and were not evidence against the company. The taxpayer's case was that the £65,000 arose from betting gains and a great number of vouchers were produced indicating that he had betted on a large scale. The figures relating to credit account betting extracted from his bank account showed net gains of £10,571 in one year and some £25,000 in six years. The company's accounts appeared to have been properly kept and contained no record of the £65,000.

b The taxpayer's son, who had worked in the same office, albeit primarily engaged in running another jointly owned company, knew nothing of it. An inspector of taxes gave evidence that, from his experience, during the relevant period profits in the form of charges made by textile merchants in excess of the controlled prices, and necessarily kept out of the company accounts, might have been available for such diversion. The commissioners held as follows: '(1) We do not accept that the [taxpayer] during the period under review made any net gain from his betting transactions. (2) We are satisfied that during the period under review the [taxpayer] received sums totalling £65,171 representing taxable income received by him which was not accounted for or disclosed to the Revenue and that wilful default was committed by the [taxpayer]. (3) The sums totalling £65,171 represent concealed profits of [the company] which were diverted to the [taxpayer] and they are assessable to Income Tax Under Schedule E upon the [taxpayer] as constituting remuneration received by him from the Company...' The commissioners confirmed the assessments on the taxpayer under Sch E and the assessments to profits tax and excess profits tax on the company. They discharged the first two assessments on the taxpayer under Sch D and adjourned the others sine die, and they determined the assessment on the company at nil. On appeal by case stated to the High Court it was conceded that the commissioners ought to have granted the application for an adjournment, and the judge^a made an order for the appeals to be reheard by different commissioners, including the appeals against the Sch D assessments, which had not been included in the stated case. The taxpayer and the company appealed, contending that the proper order was to discharge all the assessments. On behalf of the taxpayer it was submitted (i) that, even in the absence of the taxpayer's evidence, the commissioners' conclusion that the company was the source of the taxpayer's increase in wealth was based on a view of the facts that could not be reasonably entertained; (ii) that on the facts as found by the commissioners the taxpayer had diverted profits of the company behind the backs of his fellow shareholders and so the proper conclusion was that the taxpayer was accountable to the company for the £65,000, and accordingly it did not constitute remuneration for which he was assessable under Sch E; (iii) alternatively, that his health had deteriorated so much since the High Court hearing that he would never be able to give evidence with the result that the commissioners' wrongful refusal of an adjournment had in effect deprived him of the opportunity of ever giving evidence.

j Held – (i) (Sachs LJ dissenting) The assessments made on the taxpayer by the commissioners could not be discharged, and accordingly the order for a rehearing would be affirmed, for the following reasons—

(a) (Sachs LJ concurring) on all the evidence the commissioners were well entitled to conclude as they had done that no betting gains were established and, as no other possible source of gains existed than the company, which was controlled by the taxpayer, the sum of £65,000 not accounted for by the taxpayer represented concealed profits of the company diverted to the taxpayer and assessable to income tax on him under Sch E as remuneration from the company (see p 319 d, p 339 h, and p 327 d and e, post);

(b) (Sachs LJ concurring) it could not be said that the finding of the commissioners that the company was the source of the taxpayer's increase in assets was based on a conclusion that the taxpayer had diverted profits of the company in such a manner that it did not constitute remuneration for which he could be assessed under Sch E; on the contrary their finding was that it was to be regarded as remuneration (see p 319 h, p 322 e and p 327 j, post);

(c) the fact that the taxpayer had been wrongfully deprived of the opportunity of giving oral evidence before the commissioners on an appeal against the assessments under Sch E which had been made against him, did not justify the making of an order discharging the assessments; such an order could only have resulted if the taxpayer had been allowed (by an adjournment) to give evidence and the commissioners had been satisfied by that evidence that the increase in assets was attributable to betting gains (see p 320 c and d and p 328 a and b, post).

(ii) The commissioners were wrong in law in upholding the assessments to profits tax and excess profits tax made on the company because, as a result of the confusion over the question whether the taxpayer's and the company's appeals were being heard by the commissioners together, the figures and calculations and correspondence accepted by the taxpayer had been treated as admissions by and evidence against the company although they had not in fact been accepted by or proved against the company; the only evidence admissible against the company was that, while it could have earned profits in excess of those appearing in the accounts, the accounts appeared to have been properly kept; accordingly the assessments against the company should be discharged (see p 321 a to e, p 326 g and p 328 f and g, post).

(iii) The original appeals against the alternative assessments to income tax under Sch D on the first taxpayer and the taxpayer company ought not to have been ordered by the judge to be reheard because they did not form part of the cases stated and were not matters 'the determination in respect of which the case had been stated' within s 64 (6)^b of the Income Tax Act 1952; furthermore they could not be dealt with under the wider power of making 'such other order in relation to the matter as to the Court may seem fit', since the 'matter' in respect of which such an order might be made could not be anything other than the subject-matter of the determination in respect of which the case had been stated; accordingly the commissioners' order would be restored (see p 321 g and p 329 g to j, post).

Per Sachs LJ. If (which was doubtful) the General Commissioners had jurisdiction to hear the appeal of the taxpayer and the company simultaneously without their consent, their discretion in deciding to do so in the circumstances was wrongly exercised (see p 325 h and p 326 j, post).

Decision of Buckley J [1970] 2 All ER 519, affirmed in part, reversed in part.

- c 13th October. The following judgments were read.

- RUSSELL LJ. We are concerned in this matter with three appeals from three decisions of Buckley J¹ on three appeals by way of case stated from General Commissioners. The first case stated related to an appeal by the first taxpayer, Mr David Rose, against assessments under Sch E in respect of remuneration said to have been received by him in the years 1942-43 to 1950-51 from the taxpayer company, Aldersgate Textiles Ltd, a company dealing in the purchase and sale of textiles in Manchester in which he, his son Harry, and his wife were the directors and in which the same three were holders of the 100 issued shares in the proportions of 80 : 10 : 10. Put briefly it was found that over the years the asset position of the taxpayer had improved by some £65,000; there was no attempt by the taxpayer to explain this other than by asserting betting gains; the General Commissioners rejected that explanation and inferred that the source of this added wealth was the diversion of profits of the taxpayer company's trade not appearing in the latter's accounts.

- f The second case stated related to an appeal by the taxpayer company against assessments to profits tax; those assessments proceeded on the same basis that some £65,000 profits of the trade of the company did not appear in the accounts of the company, had been paid to the first taxpayer as remuneration, and under the relevant sections of the Acts relating to excess directors' remuneration were assessable to profits tax. The third case stated related to assessments to excess profits tax but was otherwise no different from the second. There were also for consideration by the General Commissioners assessments on the taxpayer company to income tax under Sch D in the same amount of £65,000 on the footing that the sum diverted by the first taxpayer was not remuneration but was a sum for which he remained accountable to the taxpayer company. In the event, the General Commissioners, having come to the conclusion that the first taxpayer had received the sum as remuneration, determined these assessments at nil. On this determination no case was stated.

- h I take first the case of the first taxpayer. His appeal to the General Commissioners had been adjourned owing to his ill-health. In June 1967 it was again due for hearing. Medical evidence was called that he could not then attend to give evidence, but that (as in the event happened) his health would improve and that he would at some time later be fit enough for that purpose. The inspector of taxes resisted an application, supported by this evidence, for an adjournment and the General Commissioners decided to proceed with the case without his evidence and refused an adjournment.
- j Now it is manifest that since his contention was that any otherwise unexplained increase in his assets was attributable to net betting gains—and indeed he had produced a great number of vouchers of various kinds which indicated that he betted on a large scale—it was quite wrong on the part of the General Commissioners to refuse an adjournment in the circumstances. It was ultimately accepted by the

Crown, before the hearing by Buckley J², that this was so, and that it constituted an error of law, and that the proper course was to set aside the determination against him, and order a rehearing by the General Commissioners. Such an order was in fact made by Buckley J², the hearing to be by a differently constituted panel of General Commissioners, after argument in which the Crown contended that the rehearing would have to be by the same panel; the Crown does not pursue that contention. a

The first taxpayer appeals against that decision of Buckley J², contending that he should have made an order in effect discharging the assessments under Sch E. Further it is contended that circumstances connected with the health of the first taxpayer that have occurred or have been revealed since the hearing before Buckley J² now require, if the injustice involved in the refusal of an adjournment is to be remedied, such an order. The contentions of the first taxpayer are briefly the following: b

(1) Even in the absence of the evidence of the first taxpayer the conclusion of the General Commissioners that the taxpayer company was the source of the increase in the assets of the first taxpayer was based on a view of the facts as stated in the case stated which could not be reasonably entertained; that the only true and reasonable view is that wherever the money may have come from it did not come from the taxpayer company either by diversion of its profits or otherwise (*Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow*³). c

(2) Alternatively the finding of the General Commissioners that the taxpayer company was the source was based on (as Buckley J² thought) a conclusion that the first taxpayer had diverted to himself profits of the taxpayer company behind the backs and without the assent of his fellow directors and shareholders. In that case the first taxpayer would be accountable to the taxpayer company for such moneys, they could not be remuneration, and assessment under Sch E could not stand; or (it was contended) on the facts set out in the case stated that conclusion was inevitable. d

(3) Alternatively, since the hearing by Buckley J² it had transpired that the health of the first taxpayer had so much deteriorated that he will never be able to give evidence. Had adjournment been ordered he would have been able to give evidence. The injustice done by the refusal to adjourn can therefore never be directly remedied. To remedy the injustice this court could and should take the only course available in that behalf and discharge the assessments. e

As to (1), it was urged for the first taxpayer that it was clear that neither Mr Blower (the inspector of taxes) nor Mr Lever (the accountant to the taxpayer company and to the first taxpayer) considered that there was anything unusual or suspicious about the accounts of the taxpayer company; they were clearly kept, with nothing on their face to suggest that they did not fully and correctly represent its trading and financial position. Moreover, the first taxpayer's son and fellow director and shareholder shared a small office with the first taxpayer—at least from his discharge from the Merchant Navy in 1945—and he stated in evidence (and he was accepted by the General Commissioners as a credible witness) that he had no knowledge of any profits being diverted from the taxpayer company or of any other irregularities. It was, it was argued, incredible that if profits of the order now under consideration were being diverted from the taxpayer company and its books the son would have been unaware of it. On the other hand there are these considerations. The son on his return from service had asked the first taxpayer whether he could have another company, London Mantle Co, in which the first taxpayer had a 50½ per cent share interest and the son the balance. With the first taxpayer's agreement the son ran the Mantle company completely on his own, the first taxpayer taking no part. The son was therefore primarily concerned with the Mantle company and there is nothing in the case stated to suggest that in evidence the son showed that he concerned himself in any way with the finances or fortunes of the taxpayer company. f a (in which his father had an 80 per cent shareholding and he but 10 per cent) or would be on the look-out for any diversion of profits or any irregularities.

Mr Blower pointed out from his experience and knowledge of the textile industry in Manchester between 1941 and 1951 one way in which profits might in the relevant period be diverted from a textile company; textile prices were controlled and it was not uncommon for textile merchants to charge more than the controlled prices; b since such 'overs' were illegal it naturally followed that they would be kept out of the accounts of a textile company, if charged. He said that it would not have been a complicated commercial transaction to have diverted £65,000 from 'a' textile company; it does not appear from the case stated whether Mr Blower was specifically referring to this company or to a company with the taxpayer company's textile turnover; nor however does it appear that he was cross-examined to suggest that c the taxpayer company turnover was such that £65,000 diversion in this manner was out of the question. (We do not know what was the turnover; the accounts were not produced to the General Commissioners.) Moreover against a history of piecemeal increases of alleged betting gains as further unexplained asset gains from time to time emerged the General Commissioners were well entitled to conclude as they did that no betting gains were established, let alone £65,000; this being so, no other d possible source of gains existed than the company that the first taxpayer controlled, the taxpayer company. Bearing all these considerations in mind I am satisfied that the first point made for the first taxpayer cannot be sustained.

As to (2)—the contention that any moneys diverted by the first taxpayer from the profits of the taxpayer company could not be remuneration and therefore the Sch E assessments must be discharged. This was referred to in the course of debate as the 'technical knock-out' point. The case stated (para 11) recited that the inspector e had asked the General Commissioners to determine in principle whether the concealed income (i.e. the £65,000) was to be treated as (a) profits assessable on the taxpayer company or (b) profits of the taxpayer company which having been diverted to the first taxpayer were chargeable on the first taxpayer under Sch E as additional remuneration received by him from the company. The answer of the General f Commissioners was in accordance with (b). They stated that they made the following decisions. I read from para 13:

'(1) We do not accept that the [first taxpayer] during the period under review made any net gain from his betting transactions. (2) We are satisfied that during the period under review the [first taxpayer] received sums totalling £65,171 representing taxable income received by him which was not accounted for or disclosed to the Revenue and that wilful default was committed by the [first taxpayer]. (3) The sums totalling £65,171 represent concealed profits of [the taxpayer company] which were diverted to the [first taxpayer] and they are assessable to Income Tax Under Schedule E upon the [first taxpayer] as constituting remuneration received by him from the Company . . .'

h In my view it is not rightly said that the General Commissioners concluded on the evidence before them that the moneys which they found came to the first taxpayer from profits of the taxpayer company were abstracted by the first taxpayer in a manner which left him accountable to the taxpayer company. On the contrary their finding was that it was to be regarded as remuneration. In those circumstances it does not appear to me that there was a finding which requires this court to discharge the Sch E assessments. It is to be noted that counsel for the first taxpayer j before the General Commissioners deliberately did not put forward a suggestion that, if the conclusion should be that the 'missing' money came from the taxpayer company, it could not in any sense be regarded as remuneration. This was because he was anxious not to involve the son in attack on his credit by introducing controversial matter if it could be avoided, since the son's own appeal based on similar contentions relating to the Mantle company was due before the same General

Commissioners—an appeal which in the event succeeded. This lends strength to the suggestion made by the Crown that if the point had been taken the son might well have been cross-examined on the lines that the son and his mother recognised that the first taxpayer had, so far as his fellow directors and shareholders were concerned, carte blanche in the affairs of the taxpayer company. The wife of the taxpayer did not give evidence.

Finally as to contention (3)—that the only way in which the injustice caused by the refusal to adjourn can now be remedied (the first taxpayer being now unable through ill-health to give evidence in support of his betting gains explanation of his increase in assets) is to discharge the Sch E assessments, without the rehearing that has at the instance of the first taxpayer been ordered by Buckley J. I cannot accept that proposition. Assessments under Sch E were made on the first taxpayer. Against those assessments he had a right to appeal to the General Commissioners. The General Commissioners wrongly deprived the first taxpayer of the opportunity of giving oral evidence in support of his betting gains explanation, and his present inability to give evidence will or may weaken his case at a rehearing. But this does not it seems to me justify this court in making an order which could only have resulted if the first taxpayer had been allowed (by an adjournment) to give evidence and the General Commissioners had been satisfied by that evidence that the increase in assets was attributable to betting gains.

In the appeal of the first taxpayer I would accordingly (subject to a point to be later mentioned on income tax) leave the first taxpayer with the order which he sought and obtained below, and which for what it may be worth he seeks in the alternative to retain, that is for a rehearing.

I turn now to the appeals of the taxpayer company in respect of profits tax and excess profits tax assessments. In these cases also the basic question was whether the increase in assets of the first taxpayer was attributable to profits of the taxpayer company diverted to the former, and hereunder of course the betting gains explanation was an important feature. It was for this reason that Buckley J set aside the decision of the General Commissioners on the assessments to profits tax and excess profits tax and ordered a rehearing of the appeals of the taxpayer company against such assessments.

For the taxpayer company it was argued in the same manner as was argued for the first taxpayer that the refusal of an adjournment (if an injustice was to be remedied) required the discharge of the assessments made on the footing that the source of his enrichment was profits made by the taxpayer company. For the same reasons I reject that contention. So also on what may be labelled the *Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow*⁴ point. It was however additionally contended that the evidence of the increase in the first taxpayer's assets was not evidence against the taxpayer company, and that accordingly there was no evidence admissible against the company which justified the General Commissioners in concluding that the company had earned profits in excess of those shown by its accounts. It is quite clear that at the hearing before the General Commissioners there was a misunderstanding. Counsel for the first taxpayer thought from an answer given by the clerk to the commissioners that the hearing was to be initially confined to the appeal by the first taxpayer against his personal assessments. The General Commissioners on the other hand intended to deal with the first taxpayer's appeal and the taxpayer company's appeals together. I think the confusion probably arose because the clerk and the General Commissioners in saying that they would deal first with the David Rose appeal had in mind the first taxpayer and his company's appeals, as distinct from Harry Rose and his company's appeal. As a result of this confusion it was only six months later that on the taxpayer company's appeals the question of admissibility of evidence was raised.

It was contended by the inspector of taxes before the General Commissioners and accepted by them that their findings in the first taxpayer's appeal necessarily led to a their findings in the taxpayer company's appeal. In one sense that is true. But it was contended for the taxpayer company that the figures and calculations (which were generally accepted as correct on behalf of the first taxpayer) were not compiled with the assistance of the first taxpayer given on behalf of the taxpayer company, or by the accountant otherwise than as the first taxpayer's accountant; and that the corb correspondence nowhere appeared to have been conducted on behalf of the taxpayer company. They could not therefore have been properly treated as containing admissions by or on behalf of the company; nor were they proved in evidence; nor admitted on behalf of the company as in any way correct. I think that this contention was sound. I think too that but for the confusion about whether the appeals were being heard together it may well be that these figures might have been proved against the taxpayer company. But they were not.

c What was then the situation as to admissible evidence in the taxpayer company's appeals? There was Mr Blower's evidence of the possibility that a textile company (because of the opportunity of 'overs') could earn profits in excess of those appearing in its accounts; and there was evidence that the taxpayer company's accounts appeared to be in 'apple pie' order. But this was all. There was lacking any admissible evidence that the company had earned more profits than appeared in its accounts, and any assessments on the company were entirely based on the assumption that it had.

d In those circumstances in my judgment the General Commissioners erred in law in upholding without any evidence (other than that the taxpayer company's accounts appeared to be properly kept) any assessments against the company and should have discharged the assessments on the company; and the learned judge should not have directed a rehearing of the taxpayer company's appeals.

e If that be the correct view the further question whether in any event the judge should have ordered additionally a rehearing of the appeals by the taxpayer company against assessments to income tax on it under Sch D, Case I, does not arise. These assessments were based on the alternative possibility that enrichment of the first taxpayer over the relevant years had been out of profits of the taxpayer company not appearing in its accounts but by the wrongful acts of the first taxpayer, so that they would be profits of the taxpayer company not received by the first taxpayer as f remuneration but for which the first taxpayer remained accountable to the company.
(I observe that if this were the situation presumably liability to assessment to profits tax and excess profits tax would co-exist but on an enhanced basis.) The assessments to income tax, which assumed no remuneration, were determined by the General Commissioners not unnaturally at nil. But these decisions formed no part of the cases stated by the General Commissioners; no dissatisfaction even in the alternative g was expressed by the Crown with their determination at nil; the machinery was not set in motion to bring before the High Court this decision of the General Commissioners. In those circumstances in my view the learned judge should in any event not have made the order which he did make that there should be a rehearing of the appeals against these assessments to income tax. The discussion of this matter is elaborated in the judgment of Stamp LJ, who reaches the same conclusion.

h A similar point arises in the appeal of the first taxpayer. Assessments were made on him to income tax under Sch D, Case I, in respect of the years 1950-51 to 1955-56 inclusive. The assessments in respect of the first two of these years were discharged by the General Commissioners (the remainder being adjourned sine die). The assessments were raised in respect of profits alleged to have arisen to the first taxpayer as a merchant. (It will be recalled that the General Commissioners stated j that there was no evidence that the first taxpayer carried on a trade in addition to carrying on the business of the taxpayer company.) As I understand the situation the assessments to income tax in respect of these two years were regarded as alternative to the Sch E assessments for the last two years of those assessments (1949-50 and 1950-51), and were for that reason discharged. There seems no difference between that case and the case of the income tax assessments on the taxpayer company, except that in the former case they were in fact mentioned in the case stated; accordingly I would hold that the appeals against those discharged assessments should not be included in the rehearing. a

Accordingly the appeal of the first taxpayer should in my judgment be dismissed, leaving the judge's order discharging the Sch E determination of the General Commissioners and ordering a retrial of the first taxpayer's appeal against those assessments; but not including in such rehearing the discharged income tax assessments for 1950-51 and 1951-52. The appeals of the taxpayer company against the determination by the General Commissioners of the assessments to profits tax and excess profits tax should in my judgment be allowed, and those assessments must be discharged. b

I wish to add that this case, as regards the assessments on the taxpayer company, demonstrates the dangers inherent in hearing appeals by two different taxpayers simultaneously. c

SACHS LJ. Taking first the appeal of the first taxpayer, it is only too obvious that the conduct of the commissioners in refusing an adjournment in the face of unchallenged medical evidence was indefensible. Indeed no suggestion has been or could be made in this court that Buckley J⁵ was in error in so holding; on the contrary even before the case was called on before him the Crown had intimated that they could not resist an order based on such a conclusion. That refusal was a grave breach of the rules of natural justice; it was also an error in law within the meaning of s 64 (6) of the Income Tax Act 1952 (cf *Dick v Piller*⁶). In the end the crucial question in the appeal is whether in the highly unusual set of circumstances this court should order that the relevant assessments should be discharged or whether the Crown, who instigated the breach, should be allowed to try to uphold them at a fresh hearing. d

Before considering that question it is convenient to deal with certain other issues canvassed before us. The first is that referred to as the 'technical knock-out' point. Being in agreement with Russell and Stamp LJ⁷ on this matter it suffices to say that in my judgment, too, the first taxpayer's submission fails for the reasons which they give. e

Next comes his contention that on the material before the commissioners their determination was so wrong that it should in any event be reversed. The test to be applied when considering such a submission is of course that enunciated in *Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow*⁷. It is for an appellant to show (per Lord Radcliffe⁸) that no person acting judicially could have come to the conclusion reached by the commissioners and that the true and only reasonable conclusion was one which contradicts their determination: in essence their decision must be shown to be perverse. f

It was conceded by counsel for the taxpayers that in practice it would be for the first taxpayer in this case to show that the true and only reasonable conclusion was that at any rate some part of the £65,000 did come from betting transactions and thus did not derive from the taxpayer company. There was however material before the commissioners on which, approaching the question in the same way as would jurors, they were entitled to refuse to accept that during the period under review the first taxpayer made any net gain from his betting transactions; their conclusions on this issue cannot be said to be perverse. That, however, is quite different from saying that such a conclusion was inevitable—in the sense that that word is used when a court has to consider whether a breach of the rules of natural justice can in practice be disregarded because it has been clearly shown that it could not have produced a miscarriage of justice. On the contrary there was considerable evidence on which it would have been reasonable to hold that the first taxpayer had made considerable betting gains over that period; there are, for instance, the figures extracted from his bank accounts relating to credit account betting which show net gains of as much as £10,571 on one year and some £27,000 over six years. Indeed g a on the documentary material before us it is by no means obvious that this is a case where the first taxpayer made no substantial betting gains as opposed to one where he exaggerated them. Looking at the matter 'on paper'—as did the commissioners—it would not have been unreasonable to hold that substantial gains had been made.

It is thus particularly a case where great importance would attach to any views the commissioners might take of the first taxpayer when observed under cross-examination in the witness-box. As Buckley J pointed out⁹ 'the whole outcome of the case depended on whether he was to be believed'. Moreover one cannot eliminate the possibility that the minds of the commissioners may wrongly have been adversely affected by their erroneous conclusion that the application for an adjournment was unwarranted and that this indicated such an evasion on the part of the first taxpayer as should be taken into account against him. Accordingly, whilst the first taxpayer's submission that the commissioners' conclusions were in essence perverse fails, the circumstances to which I have referred are highly relevant to the question of how a court should exercise any discretion it may have in making an order under s 64 (6) of the 1952 Act.

Finally, as regards preliminary points, comes the Crown's suggestion in this court that, despite the refusal of an adjournment being admittedly an error in law, the first taxpayer ought to have sought a prerogative remedy, and should be treated in this court in the same way as, and no better than, if he had adopted that speedier course. He was, however, perfectly within his rights to seek his remedy under s 64, especially as he had alternative errors of law which he wished to put forward: indeed I very much doubt whether he would have been permitted to pursue a prerogative remedy when he was in a position to avail himself of his rights under the above section. So this Crown submission fails.

e I now return to the issue whether the order for a rehearing should stand or whether this court should not only quash the determination of the commissioners but also discharge the assessments, the subject of the first taxpayer's appeal to them. This has been discussed before us on the footing that all points relevant to our decision shall be deemed to have been raised in the notice of appeal and any cross-notice by the Crown respectively—though formal documents in satisfactory form were not filed (for instance, there was nothing in the case stated to show that the refusal of an adjournment was relied on as an error in law).

f To determine this vital issue it is necessary to examine as compactly as practicable the sequence of events to which so much of the arguments were devoted during the five-day hearing in this court. It was suggested by the Crown that in some way there should be taken against the first taxpayer the lapse of time between June 1967 and the date when the prospect of the first taxpayer appearing in person ceased to exist. It is as well to start by recording some relevant dates:

h	1967—15th June	—Adjournment application refused.
	16th June	—Hearing of evidence and submissions completed.
	25th October	—Letter from commissioners stating decision on principle.
j	1968—30th January	—Sitting to announce decision on figures: formal request for case to be stated.
	1969—2nd December	—Case stated.
	1970—11th February	—Revenue communication that remission to same panel will not be opposed.
	6th March	—Hearing before Buckley J ¹⁰ .

In relation to the above dates it is to be observed that in correspondence at the end of

9 [1970] 2 All ER at 523, [1970] 1 WLR at 1071

1967 the first taxpayer referred to an already previously expressed desire to have a case stated. a

The unchallenged medical evidence put before this court early in the hearing showed that the first taxpayer was fit to attend a hearing before the commissioners by the end of September 1967 and continued thus fit over the whole of 1968 and 1969 until the spring of 1970. It is thus clear that, but for the opposition of the Crown on 15th June 1967 to the application for an adjournment then made and the commissioners acceding to that opposition, there would have been ample opportunity for a further hearing on a date when the first taxpayer could attend. It is to be observed that even when the matter was before Buckley J¹¹ it rightly proceeded on the basis that there was a reasonable chance of the first taxpayer being able to give evidence and that the order for remission to a new panel of commissioners was then quite plainly correct. Today when there is no longer any such prospect the substratum of that order has gone. (Incidentally, although this is of more importance in the taxpayer company's appeals, Mr Blower, the sole witness for the Crown, has now died.) b

None of the difficulties which have arisen in this case can be laid at the door of the first taxpayer; substantially they all stem from the course taken by the Crown, for it was conceded in this court that it would be almost inconceivable for the commissioners to have refused an adjournment had the Crown consented, as they should have done. At one stage blame was sought to be put on the first taxpayer for the appalling delay of some two years between the date a case was formally requested and the date it was stated but this suggestion was rapidly abandoned by the Crown. We were, indeed, told that delays of this order were not unusual; if so, this is scandalous—but something which must have been known by the Crown when they opposed the adjournment. Nothing in this sequence of events assists it. c

There remains the strongly pressed point that this court should have regard to the interests of the Crown as well as those of the first taxpayer in exercising its discretion—and that it would be unjust in the instant case for it to be put at risk of losing revenue which on a rehearing might be held due. Naturally when exercising its discretion in such a case as the present the interests of both parties must be considered. How then lies the balance? d

For the first taxpayer it has been rightly pointed out that the breach of the rules of natural justice was about as serious as could be, for nowadays it is a paramount right of any man charged with wilful default or fraud under the provisions of a statute normally regarded as penal to have an opportunity personally to give evidence to dispel whatever prima facie case may have been set up against him; that if there is a rehearing the matter must go forward on the basis that he must for ever be deprived of the natural justice to which he was entitled; that for an individual the sums involved are large; that he has done nothing to bring about the difficulties that now exist; that those difficulties were caused by or substantially contributed to by the Crown; and that not even on 11th February 1970 did the Crown—despite the length of time they had been aware of the taxpayer's case—concede to him the only just remedy, a rehearing before a fresh panel. e

For the Crown were put forward the general interests of the public in the gathering of taxes; the injustice of their being deprived of a chance of success when the onus of obtaining a discharge of the assessments lay on the taxpayer; and the other points to which reference has already been made. Finally it was suggested that as the disablement or death of a taxpayer would not in normal circumstances be any obstacle to pursuing Revenue claims, there was no reason in the present case why the rehearing should not take place as ordered. f

Naturally one has no sympathy for a taxpayer who seems at any rate to have escalated the aggregate of his betting gains to match the claims of the Crown. Nonetheless it is manifest that had an elementary feature of natural justice not been disregarded he might well have shown the assessments appealed were at least in some g a degree erroneous—as incidentally did his son on his appeal. When that state of affairs is one for which the Crown cannot escape substantial blame the balance of the justice of the case is, in my judgment, deeply tipped against the Crown. No case has been cited in which a party who was thus to blame has yet succeeded in, so to speak, shrugging off irremediable consequences; nor is it likely that such a case will occur, least of all when that party is seeking to enforce penal provisions of a statute. There is simply no analogy between this case and one where a taxpayer becomes disabled from appearing by some natural misfortune for which no one can be blamed.

Accordingly in my judgment the assessments appealed from should be discharged if this court has jurisdiction to do so. For my part I have no doubt that the concluding words of s 64 (6) 'may make such other order in relation to the matter as to the Court may seem fit' give this court jurisdiction to make such order as may be just in the circumstances. Any contrary contention involves assuming an intention on the part of the legislature to force the court to do injustice in certain cases. The point that technically an assessment stands unless the taxpayer displaces it is one which makes it all the more manifest that justice demands a discharge—and the taxpayer should not be left to bear such round figure assessment as may have been selected. I would on those grounds allow the appeal of the first taxpayer by quashing the determination of the commissioners and discharging all the relevant assessments.

d Turning now to the taxpayer company's appeals it is clear that the commissioners based their decisions on inadmissible evidence; accordingly on that ground alone it is necessary to quash their determinations—quite apart from the other matters on which the taxpayer company is entitled to rely. It is, however, also to be observed that the inspector of taxes, after accepting that the onus of establishing that there had been fraud or wilful default in relation to all the years of assessment, failed, as stated by e Russell LJ, to adduce any admissible evidence against the taxpayer company. Moreover he also failed to put any questions whatsoever in cross-examination either to the first taxpayer or to Mr Lever (the accountant) on the 'overs' allegation to which the commissioners seemed to have attached so much importance. Accordingly they should have allowed the taxpayer company's appeals.

f The Crown, however, has been bold enough to contend that, as the hearing was for other reasons a mistrial, they should, despite having mismanaged their case there, be granted a fresh hearing in these matters. It is thus of some importance to examine the reasons why the hearing must be adjudged a mistrial so as to consider whether the discretion of this court should be exercised in favour of the Crown.

g There are two separate grounds on which the hearing must be held to be either a nullity or so irregular that no effect can be given to it. The first is that the taxpayer company was wrongly refused an adjournment without which it was unable to adduce the evidence of its principal witness, the first taxpayer. This is a matter with which I have already dealt when considering the appeal of the first taxpayer and thus needs no further discussion. The second ground is similarly produced by yet another unhappy set of facts relating to the procedure of these commissioners. The taxpayer h company made an application that there should be a separate hearing of its appeals so that the evidence relating to its appeal should not be heard simultaneously with that adduced in the appeal of the first taxpayer. Assuming that the commissioners had jurisdiction to hear the appeals simultaneously (a point to which I will return later in this judgment) and thus had a discretion in the matter, it seems to me that their discretion was wrongly exercised. It is not normally practicable for a lay tribunal in a complex case such as the present to hear at one and the same time the evidence in j two separate appeals and keep distinct what is evidence in one but not evidence in the other. It is quite likely that such a tribunal will fail in such a task—as indeed happened in the instant case. It would have been wiser to accede to the application.

The commissioners, however, not only decided to reject this reasonable application but failed properly to announce their decision. For some reason their chairman, whose function it was to announce what had been decided, left it to their clerk. The latter proceeded to make a statement of such lack of clarity as to lead counsel for the taxpayer company reasonably to understand that its application had been granted. The result of the misunderstanding was disastrous. Counsel for the taxpayer company naturally adduced no arguments on its behalf at the June hearings. Nonetheless the commissioners by their 25th October letter announced that they had decided against it. The upshot was that at the sitting of 30th January 1968 junior counsel for the taxpayers was put into the position of attempting on behalf of the taxpayer company to persuade the commissioners to reverse the conclusion they had previously reached—not exactly a happy or attractive situation or one likely to lead to the appearance of justice being done. In fact the submissions for the taxpayer company failed—the commissioners yet again accepting ill-founded arguments of the Crown. a

Thus as regards these appeals this court has to consider how to exercise its discretion to make such order as may seem fit—remembering that the assessments under review go back as far as 1942-43 (almost 30 years) and that the Revenue have been pursuing the matters in issue for the best part of two decades. It is in this behalf relevant to observe that the Revenue have as regards matters arising under the relevant sections of the Finance Acts (e.g. the proviso of s 47 (1) of the 1952 Act and s 51 of the 1960 Act) gradually secured from the legislature a position which it is meiosis to describe as formidable. Once the taxpayer is found to have been guilty of a neglect (so defined by s 63 of the 1960 Act as to include a minor inadvertent error) the Revenue may allege wilful default and fraud going back by stages until at any rate 1936; and often can in practice lay the onus on the taxpayer to obtain a discharge of an assessment—and bear all the consequent expenses (unless and until the matter comes before the courts) and anxieties even if he proves to be right. b

When powers exist to open up matters going back an inordinate number of years the borderline between what is reasonable for the protection of the Revenue and what is oppressive vis-à-vis the taxpayer can become blurred. In general the discretion exercised by the Revenue can be relied on to ensure that the line is not crossed. But cases can arise when it is appropriate for the court to consider whether in the interests of justice some limit should be put to the pursuit of the taxpayer when the Crown have previously had every opportunity to examine the matter and to assist to bring proceedings to a conclusion. In the instant case the Crown have had such opportunities but by their own mismanagement and by taking false points have by now reached that limit. c

Incidentally there is one further point to be mentioned—since the hearings under appeal the rules as to hearsay evidence have been altered by the Civil Evidence Act 1968, and the Crown contend that they should now have the advantage of that change—which they could not have had if they had not put forward ill-founded arguments. That contention lacks attraction. Accordingly in these, I hope, unusual circumstances the Crown should not be granted a rehearing; the taxpayer company's appeals should in my judgment be allowed, and the relevant assessments discharged. d

There remain two matters that require mention. The first is the primary ground of objection taken by counsel for the taxpayers on 15th June 1967 to the appeals of the first taxpayer and the taxpayer company being heard together by the commissioners—that they had no jurisdiction to take such a course. This is in the circumstances a point that does not fall to be determined on this occasion. It suffices to note that there is no set of regulations dealing with the procedure before the commissioners and accordingly their jurisdiction on appeals depends on the contents of the statute that provides for it, taking into account the nature of the legislation as a whole. Whether the statute which gives a right of appeal to a taxpayer and the right to have it heard by commissioners can be so construed that the appeal can, without the consent of all parties concerned, be actually heard together with those of one or more other parties—however convenient that course may be—is manifestly an arguable question. Moreover counsel for the Crown when dealing with the point referred with his usual frankness to the fact that any hearing of an appeal by commissioners was supposed to e a be something not to be communicated outside the parties without their consent. The point has apparently never been decided by the High Court, although we understand it has been canvassed before commissioners; it is a pity that there exists no regulation dealing with it.

b The other matter of concern is that unfortunately this is not the only Revenue case to come before me relatively recently in which it has become apparent that commissioners have, at the instance of a representative of the Revenue, acted in a way that showed notable lack of attention to the requirements of natural justice—or fair play in action as it is often now called. One has every sympathy with men called on to adjudicate on numbers of cases under the pressure that ensues from those numbers being large and the time available short; indeed one of the main factors resulting in the confusion which occurs in such cases is a desire to save as much time as practicable. But the existence of such a desire should of itself engender caution.

c These two matters indeed provide an indication that the time may have come for a review or reinforcement of the system of appeals—coupled with an issue of regulations to minimise the chances of the taxpayer becoming the subject of injustices that can only be expensively remedied by appeals to the High Court.

d STAMP LJ. I also take first the case of the first taxpayer. I find it quite impossible to hold on the facts found by the General Commissioners that they erred in law in their conclusion that the unexplained accretion of capital wealth did not arise from betting transactions; and in my judgment on the facts found the commissioners could properly conclude that the accretion arose from moneys received by the first taxpayer in respect of dealings with cloth belonging to the taxpayer company which did not go through the books of that company. Much play was made by the first taxpayer of the fact that the accounts of the taxpayer company were according to the evidence apparently in order and of the fact found by the General Commissioners that Mr Harry Rose (the first taxpayer's son) had no knowledge of any profit being diverted from the taxpayer company to the first taxpayer or of any other irregularities. But there is no finding that Mr Harry Rose concerned himself at all with the management of that company's day-to-day business. Illicit transactions must be carried out secretly and the fact that a man's co-director who shares an office with him is unaware of the existence of any illicit transaction, although no doubt one of the facts which must be taken into account in determining whether there have been illicit transactions, is only one of those facts. There is no reason to suppose that the General Commissioners did not give that fact due weight. The General Commissioners' finding that the £65,000 represented concealed profits of the taxpayer company diverted to the first taxpayer is not in my judgment one to which no person acting judicially and properly instructed as to the relevant law could have come.

g As Russell LJ has said, the taxpayers' advisers, for a reason unconnected with the first taxpayer's appeal, purposely did not take the point that the first taxpayer having illicitly received moneys belonging to the taxpayer company became accountable to the taxpayer company for those moneys which accordingly were not remuneration assessable under Sch E. The inspector of taxes is entitled to say that had the point been taken the hearing before the commissioners would have taken a different course. One does not know what a different cross-examination of Mr Harry Rose, which was viewed by his advisers with apprehension, might not have disclosed, and one is in ignorance of any general authority which the first taxpayer may have had from the other two shareholders in the taxpayer company to fix his own remuneration. The articles of association of the taxpayer company were not in evidence. For these reasons the point, involving a finding of fact or an inference drawn from the facts, that the first taxpayer had no general authority, express or implied, to fix or retain his own remuneration is not in my judgment one which ought to be allowed to be taken on appeal.

Nor in my judgment is the submission well-founded that, because the commissioners wrongly refused an adjournment, thereby subjecting the first taxpayer to an injustice which, because of his present state of health, cannot now be remedied, the Sch E assessment ought to be discharged. In the absence of a finding that the Sch E assessments were wrongly made they cannot in my judgment be discharged. I, like Russell LJ, would leave the first taxpayer with the order which he sought and obtained below: a rehearing.

I turn to consider the appeals by the taxpayer company. At the first hearing before the General Commissioners counsel for the taxpayer company, having submitted that the appeals of that company should be heard separately, was led to believe that that submission had been acceded to. At that stage he accordingly did not make the submission that evidence in the first taxpayer's appeal, and more particularly admissions made by the first taxpayer in the correspondence and interviews which he had with the inspector of taxes, was not evidence against the taxpayer company, and when that submission was made at the later hearing in January 1968 the commissioners did not accept it. It is perhaps understandable that the commissioners should have been reluctant to come to a conclusion, which to a layman must have all the elements of absurdity, that as between the Crown and the first taxpayer the £65,000 represented money derived from dealings with the taxpayer company's cloth and so money belonging to the company which was to be taken as applied in paying remuneration to the first taxpayer, whereas as between the taxpayer company and the Crown it has not been shown that the money was derived from such dealings. They robustly concluded that the money was income of the taxpayer company which the company had paid to the first taxpayer by way of remuneration and that for the purposes of excess profits tax and profits tax it was to be so regarded. It is clear from the cases stated by the commissioners that they came to this conclusion on the basis that the issue was concluded by their decision on the appeal of the first taxpayer and without consideration of what evidence given on that appeal—even if it had been heard together with the appeals of the taxpayer company—was admissible against the company and without making any findings of fact on that admissible evidence.

This being so I find the conclusion that the commissioners were wrong in law in upholding the assessments against the taxpayer company inescapable. I confess to having entertained a doubt whether in the circumstances it is right to discharge those assessments or to affirm the learned judge's¹² decision to direct a rehearing of the taxpayer company's appeals. But having had the advantage of reading the judgment of Russell LJ I conclude, for the reasons which he gives, that the assessments ought to be discharged; more particularly because there was lacking any admissible evidence that the taxpayer company had earned more profits than appeared in its accounts and there was evidence that those accounts had been kept properly.

After the learned judge had delivered his judgment¹², holding that there had been mistrials, it was submitted on behalf of the inspector of taxes that there should be a rehearing of certain other determinations of the commissioners: determinations in respect of which neither side had expressed dissatisfaction and in respect of which there was no appeal to the court by way of case stated. In particular there were assessments on the first taxpayer under Case I of Sch 2 on the footing that the undisclosed accretion, or part of it, represented profits made by him in respect of some unspecified trading activity not derived from the taxpayer company and assessments on the taxpayer company under Case I of Sch D on the footing that the moneys were not moneys received by the first taxpayer as remuneration assessable on him under Sch E but moneys received by and belonging to the taxpayer company. These assessments were alternative to the Sch E assessments on the first taxpayer, and if there was to be a rehearing of the appeal against the Sch E assessments at which the point might be taken that the money received by the first taxpayer was money for

- a which he was accountable to the taxpayer company the justice of the case required that the determinations of the General Commissioners in effect discharging these alternative assessments should also be the subject of the rehearing. The learned judge¹³ acceded to the submission of the Crown and his decision in that respect is challenged by the taxpayers on these appeals, it being contended that there is no jurisdiction in the court on an appeal by way of case stated to direct a rehearing of an appeal to the commissioners against an assessment when the commissioners have made a determination thereon in respect of which no dissatisfaction has been expressed and regarding which there is of necessity no question raised in the case stated for the decision of the court.
- b

The jurisdiction of the High Court is a statutory jurisdiction conferred by s 64 of the Income Tax Act 1952, to be found in Chapter 3 of Part II of that Act: a section of the Act which is concerned with appeals against assessments. Section 51 conferred a right on a person aggrieved by any assessment to appeal to the General Commissioners and s 62 conferred an option, where assessments under Sch D are made, to appeal to the Special Commissioners instead of the General Commissioners. Section 64, conferring jurisdiction on the High Court, provided:

(1) Immediately after the determination of an appeal by the General Commissioners, or by the Special Commissioners, the appellant or the surveyor [the reference to the surveyor is for present purposes a reference to the inspector of taxes], if dissatisfied with the determination as being erroneous in point of law, may declare his dissatisfaction to the Commissioners who heard the appeal. [I pause to observe that the appeal spoken of in that subsection is an appeal against an assessment.]

d

(2) The appellant or surveyor, as the case may be, having declared his dissatisfaction, may, within twenty-one days after the determination, by notice in writing addressed to the clerk to the Commissioners, require the Commissioners to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court thereon. [There are then provisions relating to the payment of the fee for the case stated, its form and other provisions which are not material for present purposes.]

e

(6) The High Court shall hear and determine any question or questions of law arising on the case, and shall reverse, affirm or amend the determination in respect of which the case has been stated, or shall remit the matter to the Commissioners with the opinion of the Court thereon, or may make such other order in relation to the matter as to the Court may seem fit.

I emphasise the words 'the determination in respect of which the case has been stated', which can only refer to the determination of the commissioners of the appeal against an assessment in respect of which dissatisfaction has been expressed; and it is in my judgment clear that the section confers no power on the High Court 'to reverse, affirm or amend' a determination in respect of which no case has been stated. The Crown nevertheless fastening on the phrase 'or may make such other order in relation to the matter as to the Court may seem fit' submit that that phrase, with its use of the words 'the matter', is wide enough to confer jurisdiction in relation to assessments which are not before the court but are associated or connected with the assessments which are before the court. In my judgment this submission is not well founded. Reading the subsection as a whole I cannot doubt that the phrase relied on does no more than confer on the court a power in a proper case, instead of reversing affirming or amending the determination of the Special Commissioners in respect of which the case has been stated, or remitting the matter to the commissioners, to make such other order in relation thereto as the court thinks fit. The 'matter' cannot in my judgment be anything other than the subject-matter of the determination in respect of which the case has been stated.

FAMILY DIVISION

HOLLINGS J

26th OCTOBER 1971

Divorce – Practice – Pleading – Time – Leave to file answer out of time – Leave to file answer containing cross-prayer alleging adultery – Reasonable cause for delay shown – No prejudice to respondent in maintenance proceedings by refusal of leave – Respondent free to raise allegation of adultery in ancillary proceedings – Respondent's right to have allegation, if established, made the subject of a public decree.

On 24th August 1971 the husband filed a petition for divorce alleging that the wife had committed adultery and that he found it intolerable to live with her. Acknowledgment of service of the petition was delivered on 3rd September by the wife who indicated her intention not to defend. The time for filing an answer without leave expired on 25th September. On 18th October evidence of the husband's adultery committed in August or September came into the hands of the wife's solicitors. Thereupon the wife obtained an emergency legal aid certificate and at the hearing on 26th October applied for leave to file an answer containing a cross-prayer founded on the allegation of the husband's adultery. It was contended by the husband that the application should not be granted on the ground that it would cause delay and extra costs to the husband and, by allowing the petition to proceed undefended, the wife's right to maintenance would in no way be prejudiced in that she could bring up all matters of the husband's conduct, including adultery, in the subsequent ancillary proceedings.

Held – On the facts the wife had shown reasonable cause for the delay in filing an answer; although the wife had nothing to lose by allowing the husband's petition to remain undefended insofar as her rights to maintenance would be completely preserved, nevertheless it was important for a respondent, if she so desired, and was advised that she had good grounds for a decree, to seek to obtain a cross-decree; furthermore the wife's interest in having her allegations against the husband considered by the court and, if established, made the subject of a public decree, outweighed the slight inconvenience of the delay and extra costs incurred by the husband; accordingly the application would be allowed (see p 332 f and p 333 g and h, post).

Application

The respondent wife to a petition for a decree of divorce applied for leave to file out of time an answer containing a cross-prayer for a decree founded on an allegation that the husband had committed adultery. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- b F H L Petre for the wife.
T H K Berry for the husband.

- HOLLINGS J. In this application the cause has been referred to me sitting in the county court by his Honour Judge Beresford, before whom it came today as an undefended cause, in which Paul Anthony Huxford, the husband, sought a divorce from his wife, Joan Lilian Huxford, on the ground of the irretrievable breakdown of the marriage based on the facts, under s 2 (1) (a) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, that the marriage had broken down irretrievably, the wife had committed adultery with John Alexander McMillan, the co-respondent, and the husband found it intolerable to live with his wife. At that hearing, counsel appeared for the husband and due notice having been given of the intention to do so by a letter of 22nd October 1971 counsel appeared on behalf of the wife and made application to the county court judge for leave to file an answer containing a cross-prayer on the very same ground, i e s 2 (1) (a), alleging that the husband had himself been guilty of adultery with another woman. Now as counsel for the wife said in opening this application to me, under the old law, no doubt, such an application would have gone through without more, but now that the Divorce Reform Act 1969 is in force I can see, as his Honour apparently said, that different considerations might well apply whether the court should grant leave to file such an answer. Of course the effect of filing such an answer would be to translate the undefended cause into a defended cause and that would make it necessary for the suit to be transferred, would have the effect indeed of automatically transferring the suit into the High Court. In view of the new law and in view no doubt of the undoubted fact that whatever the decree may be, the conduct of the parties on either side can still be raised for all ancillary purposes, the county court judge decided that it had better be referred to a High Court judge to decide whether leave should be granted.

- Now there are two factors which I must consider. One is whether a matter of general principle is involved and, if so, which way to decide that matter of general principle and, secondly, what are the merits of this particular application. In opening the application, and these are the facts which I assume for the purpose of this decision, counsel for the wife said the following in relation to the various dates. The petition was filed as recently as 24th August 1971; it was served on 27th August. Acknowledgment of service was delivered on 3rd September by the wife indicating her intention not to defend. The case was set down for hearing on 16th September and notice of hearing on this date was given on 12th October. The time for filing an answer without leave expired on 25th September. The facts briefly relating to the marriage are that the parties for one reason or another separated in August 1971. There was adultery by the wife, which I understand will be admitted, from February 1971 onwards. When the husband found this out, the wife admitted it to him. It was suggested and agreed that she should stay until July to see how it worked out and during that time it appears the husband met the other woman. In July the husband suggested that the wife should leave the matrimonial home and she left. It is stated by counsel for the wife that she sought reconciliation and that the husband refused and later, the second occasion I think it was, when she sought reconciliation, by direct approach, he told her that another woman was involved. Counsel for the husband has told me that there was an occasion when he did admit his adultery to the wife. It may be that that is the same occasion. Then counsel for the wife told me that the wife instructed an enquiry agent, but no evidence could be obtained until on 11th October some hearsay evidence was obtained to the effect that the other woman was in the house or living with the husband. On 18th October he told me that what is best described as admissible evidence was available; in other words documentary evidence, I suppose, from the enquiry agent had come into the hands of counsel for the wife's instructing solicitors which indicated that there was satisfactory evidence of the husband's adultery. That adultery, as I understand it, was commencing—and here I am not absolutely clear—by about August or more probably September. In those circumstances the wife applied for and was granted an emergency legal aid certificate on 21st October and under that this application has been made. I say at the outset that counsel for the husband has admitted that there has been this adultery, although no specific admission as to dates or names has been made and it has been indicated by counsel that if a cross-prayer were allowed, then providing there is nothing surprising in the allegation of adultery, adultery would be admitted. Now, says counsel for the wife, that evidence which came into the hands of the wife's solicitors on 18th October was of course nearly a month after the relevant date for putting in an answer without the leave of the court. Up until 25th September the wife could, without applying for the leave of the court, have put in an answer with a cross-prayer in it alleging this adultery. In those circumstances the judge before whom it would eventually appear would have had before him evidence on which he could grant a decree if he was so minded to both parties. There is no doubt I think that on those facts the probabilities are that a decree would have been granted to both parties. So, counsel for the wife says that really she had a right until 25th September. She now has to apply for leave because she has delayed and, provided she can show reasonable cause for that delay, the court should in its discretion give her leave, provided of course no great hardship is caused to the husband. So far as the husband is concerned, the only harm that I can see is (a) the delay itself, and I have been told nothing makes that more than just delay; and (b) the fact, which I assume, that he will have to bear his own costs of today which have been thrown away because the wife was not in a position, or would not be in a position even if an order for the costs of today were made against her, to pay those costs. I have no doubt an order would not be made in those circumstances bearing in mind that she is a legally aided person with a small contribution. On the facts placed before me by counsel for the wife, I would say that a valid reason has been placed before the court to show why no answer was filed before 25th September.

Now in regard to those facts, counsel for the husband points out, adultery has at no time been denied by the husband. Indeed he tells me that the husband did tell his wife that he had committed adultery. I have referred to that already in the earlier part of my decision. He suggests that the wife's solicitors ought to have written to the husband's solicitors asking if they would produce evidence of his own adultery.

As appears from the letters, the first one dated 18th October, the wife's solicitors had very much in mind the question of her maintenance and the fact that adultery on the part of the husband might have some good effect on the amount of her maintenance. But I do not think it would be right for me to criticise, particularly with hindsight, the wife or her solicitors for not writing and asking for evidence of the husband's adultery at an early stage. So I am left simply with this burden of costs to be borne by the husband, plus the delay I have referred to, to weigh against the wife's desire to be enabled to file an answer. Now, says counsel for the husband, under the Divorce Reform Act 1969 first there is no longer a matrimonial offence. The essential ground on which a decree is founded is irretrievable breakdown, and secondly, it is pointed out, that decree or no decree the wife's rights to maintenance are completely preserved. Her rights to bring up all matters of the husband's conduct including adultery are completely preserved and so the amount of her maintenance, whether she should get it and other matters of that kind would, it is a true, not be affected one way or the other by a decree being given also to her. Yet, says counsel for the wife, the reality is, and here I agree, that the decree goes out before the public as one not only where the marriage has irretrievably broken down, but where the evidence of that breakdown is the fact of the wife's adultery. He says, a mere matter of lapse in time for which there is a good excuse should not deprive the wife of the right which she had before that lapse of time to file an answer and give herself an opportunity of obtaining for herself a decree against her husband. I have been referred by counsel for the husband amongst other cases to *Trestain v Trestain*¹. There, to read the headnote, Singleton LJ said²:

'Where a husband obtains a decree for the dissolution of his marriage, but the evidence shows that he is the spouse responsible for the break-up of the marriage, there is no bar to the wife's obtaining an award of maintenance.'

c Denning LJ said in his judgment³:

'I desire to say emphatically that the fact that the husband has obtained this decree does not give a true picture of the conduct of the parties. I agree that the marriage has irretrievably broken down and that it is better dissolved. So let it be dissolved. But when it comes to maintenance, or any of the other ancillary questions which follow on divorce, then let the truth be seen. If this wife had herself sought a divorce, she would in all probability have been granted one. She could, for instance, have got it by going on with her original petition; or, if she had put in a cross-prayer for divorce in these proceedings, she would probably have been granted it, at any rate in this court, even if the husband had also been granted a divorce on his petition. She ought not to be in any worse position simply because she does not wish herself to ask for a divorce.'

d But Denning LJ then referred⁴ to the then recent case of *Sydenham v Sydenham and Illingworth*⁵ and said that in that case the court was able to see that justice was done by granting a decree to both parties and in so doing it followed the suggestion of Viscount Simon LC in *Blunt v Blunt*⁶. There have, he said, been other unreported cases on the same lines. In the present case, he went on, they could not take that course because the wife did not herself ask for a decree in her own favour. Though not in the same context, I consider that passage affords some support for the wife's application in the present case. Notwithstanding the enactment of the 1969 Act I am of the opinion that it is important still for a respondent if she so desires and, if she is advised that she has good grounds for obtaining a decree, to seek to obtain a cross-decree even though she is vulnerable to a decree being granted to the other party and even though it does not of itself assist her right to maintenance. On that ground of principle I do not think that counsel for the wife is debarred from making this application.

g I come back now to the merits; I have outlined them. It all comes down, as I said before, to the delay and costs. I think that the wife's interest in having her allegations against the husband considered by the court and, if established, made the subject of a public decree outweighs the slight inconvenience of the delay and the extra costs incurred by the husband. For that reason I allow the application.

SIR GEORGE BAKER P AND REES J

21ST, 22ND JULY, 13TH OCTOBER 1971

Magistrates – Husband and wife – Maintenance order – Jurisdiction – Application for order against person resident in dominions outside the United Kingdom – Application by wife ordinarily resident in Manchester to justices in Manchester for order against husband resident in Isle of Man – Husband absent from hearing – Wife's cause of complaint wholly arising outside United Kingdom – Jurisdiction to entertain application where wife or husband ordinarily resident within petty sessional area of the court to which the application is made even though cause of complaint arising outside United Kingdom – Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act 1920, s 3 – Matrimonial Proceedings (Magistrates' Courts) Act 1960, s 1 (2).

By s 3 (1)^a of the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act 1920, where an application was made to a court of summary jurisdiction in England for a maintenance order against a person who was resident in a part of Her Majesty's dominions outside the United Kingdom to which the Act extended, the court, if after hearing the evidence it was satisfied of the justice of the application, was empowered in the absence of the defendant to make any such order as it might have made if a summons had been duly served on the defendant and he had failed to appear; but such an order was to be provisional only and was to be of no effect until it was confirmed by a competent court in the dominion concerned. The Summary Jurisdiction Acts were applied to proceedings under s 3 of the 1920 Act by s 7 of that Act; accordingly, a complainant seeking a provisional maintenance order under s 3 had to establish that the court to which the application was made had jurisdiction to make the order. The jurisdiction of magistrates' courts to hear a complaint in matrimonial proceedings was governed by s 1 (2) of the Matrimonial Proceedings (Magistrates' Courts) Act 1960 which gave jurisdiction '(a) if at the date of the making of the complaint either the complainant or the defendant ordinarily resides within the petty sessions area for which [the] court acts; or (b) . . . if the cause of complaint arose wholly or partly within the said petty sessions area . . .'

The husband and wife were married in the Isle of Man in 1965. They lived together there until June 1970 when the wife left the husband. She stayed two or three weeks in the Isle of Man and then went with her child to Manchester. On 18th December 1970 the wife applied to Manchester City justices, under s 3 of the 1920 Act, for a provisional maintenance order against the husband on the grounds of cruelty and constructive desertion. At the date of the application the wife was ordinarily resident within the area of the court, but the husband was then resident, and always had been resident, in the Isle of Man, i.e. outside the United Kingdom, and he was absent from the hearing of the wife's application. Further, the cause of complaint, the cruelty and constructive desertion alleged by the wife, arose (if at all) outside the United Kingdom, i.e. in the Isle of Man. The 1920 Act extended to the Isle of Man. On the question whether the justices had jurisdiction to entertain the wife's application for maintenance,

Held – The court had jurisdiction notwithstanding that the cause of complaint arose wholly outside the area of the court, and even outside the United Kingdom, provided that the complainant wife satisfied s 1 (2) (a) of the 1960 Act by proving that she or the husband ordinarily resided within the petty sessional area for which the court acted; for s 1 (2) of the 1960 Act specified alternative grounds on which jurisdiction might be based and neither authority nor public policy required that there

a should be implied as a condition of the exercise of the power to make an order under s 3 of the 1920 Act, that the cause of complaint arose wholly or partly within the area of the court to which the application was made, or at least within the United Kingdom; and the defendant's interests were protected by the machinery of the 1920 Act (see p 342 h and j and p 343 c, post).

Re Wheat [1932] All ER Rep 48 considered.

b Per Curiam. There is no power on an application under the 1920 Act for the court to make an order for custody of a child. If however the court of summary jurisdiction has power apart from the 1920 Act to make a custody order in respect of a child so as to render that child a 'dependant' whom the husband is liable to maintain, then the machinery of the 1920 Act may be set in motion to enforce a maintenance order in respect of such child (see p 337 a and b, post).

Appeal

h This was an appeal by the wife against the dismissal by Manchester City justices on 18th December 1970 of her application for a provisional maintenance order, under the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act 1920, against the husband who was resident in the Isle of Man. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

i I T R Davidson for the wife.

j M L Brent for the husband:

Cur adv vult

13th October. SIR GEORGE BAKER P read the judgment of the court. This is an appeal against the dismissal by the Manchester City justices on 18th December 1970, of what is described in the heading of the notes of evidence, as an—'Application for a provisional maintenance order under the provisions of the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act 1920, on the grounds of cruelty and constructive desertion.'

The memorandum of dismissal entered in the register of the court describes the matter of complaint as 'Application for a provisional maintenance order on the grounds of cruelty and desertion'. It is important to see exactly what the justices were dealing with, because the notice of appeal first refers to the dismissal of—

'the applicant's application for a provisional maintenance order on the ground of cruelty and for custody and maintenance of the child Diane'.

Then it asks this court—

'to make a provisional order on the ground of cruelty, or alternatively on that of desertion, and for custody and maintenance of Diane, or in the alternative to remit the matter to the said justices for re-hearing and determination by them.'

Having heard this appeal on 21st and 22nd July 1971, we intimated that the appeal would be dismissed and that we would give our reasons at a later date.

The Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act 1920, which we will refer to hereafter as 'the 1920 Act', provides by s 3 (1):

'Where an application is made to a court of summary jurisdiction in England or Ireland for a maintenance order against any person, and it is proved that that person is resident in a part of His Majesty's dominions outside the United Kingdom to which this Act extends, the court may, in the absence of that person, if after hearing the evidence it is satisfied of the justice of the application, make any such order as it might have made if a summons had been duly served on that person and he had failed to appear at the hearing, but in such case the order shall be provisional only, and shall have no effect unless and until confirmed by a competent court in such part of His Majesty's dominions as aforesaid.'

A right of appeal against a refusal to make such a provisional order is given by s 3 (6) of the 1920 Act.

The expression 'maintenance order' is defined in s 10 as—

'an order other than an order of affiliation for the periodical payment of sums of money towards the maintenance of the wife or other dependants of the person against whom the order is made'.

'Dependants' are there also defined as—

'such persons as that person is, according to the law in force in the part of His Majesty's dominions in which the maintenance order was made, liable to maintain'.

We are not satisfied that the justices understood that they had before them, or adjudicated on, the issue as to the custody of and maintenance for the child, Diane, born on 30th December 1962, who was living with the wife in Manchester. The absence of any reference to the custody or maintenance of the child in the description of the nature of the application in the heading of the notes of evidence and in the memorandum of dismissal in the court register, taken together with the fact that the justices' reasons are likewise silent on the point, in our opinion fully justify the conclusion which we have expressed above. In our judgment this conclusion is well founded notwithstanding that the wife in the course of her evidence is recorded as having said, 'The child is with me and I apply for custody', and produced the birth certificate.

In the last of the additional grounds of appeal, it is said that the justices were wrong

a in not committing custody of the child of the family to the wife, even though they dismissed her application in her own behalf; but there is no power on an application under the 1920 Act for the court to make an order for custody of a child. As counsel well put it, there can be no export of a custody order. In any event, no court could have made a custody order on the information available in this case. If, however, the court of summary jurisdiction has power apart from the 1920 Act to make a custody order in respect of a child so as to render that child a 'dependant' whom the husband is liable to maintain, then the machinery of the 1920 Act may be set in motion to enforce a maintenance order in respect of such child. (See by analogy *Harris v Harris*¹ in which a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division upheld such an order made under reciprocal Australian legislation and enforced in England.) That concludes the matter of the child.

c The brief undisputed facts of the case are that the parties were married on 15th April 1965 in the registrar's office in Douglas, Isle of Man, in the terms of the Acts of Tynwald. They lived together in Douglas until 15th June 1970, when the wife left the husband, stayed two or three weeks in the Isle of Man, and then took herself, with the child to Manchester. The wife's complaints, as given in her evidence, are that the marriage had never been happy, that in 1968 there had been a quarrel about her going out with girls, and that in March 1969, when she again went out, she was locked out. There was a fight and she was told that if she went out like that again she would have to get out of the house. Later that year she again went out with a girl called Pamela Crellin, aged 19, got home about midnight and found that she had been once more locked out of the house. She stayed away for some three weeks, and then returned and got into the house by using her own key. In June 1970 she again went out with Pamela Crellin, and was once more locked out. e On the following day she broke down the door; but when she entered her husband, so she said, hit her and bruised her. She left, staying for a week with Mr and Mrs Crellin, Pamela's parents, stayed three weeks with friends, and finally went to live in a flat in Manchester, in the same house that Mr Crellin—who appears to have left Mrs Crellin—is living. The wife is about 33 or 34 years of age. Mr Crellin, who f was a verger at a church in the Isle of Man, gave evidence that there had been no improper behaviour between them; but, perhaps not surprisingly, the husband, clearly suspected adultery. He wrote a number of very strongly worded letters at the end of 1970, containing numerous threats and allegations.

The justices did not accept the wife's evidence. They say in their reasons:

g 'In this particular case we are at great disadvantage in only being able to hear the evidence of the [wife] and her witness, but at the outset must say that we feel unable to accept the truth of the evidence either of them gave before us. The [wife] in particular was most hesitant and, it almost seemed, reluctant to give full details of the allegations she was making against the husband, and we feel unable to attribute this solely to nervousness.'

h They then dealt with the various allegations made by the wife, found her statement that she went out with Pamela Crellin, a girl of 19, incapable of belief, and came to the conclusion that the husband was bound to draw the inference that there was an association with Mr Crellin. They concluded:

j 'Taking all the above factors into account, we feel that the [wife] is the author of her own misfortunes and accordingly dismiss her application.'

Counsel for the wife has argued the appeal on the facts of the case with great clarity and skill, but we cannot see any reason for upsetting the clear conclusion to which the justices came. They saw the two witnesses and read the letters, and they alone were in a position to judge whether they could accept the truth of the evidence given to them. They did not accept that evidence. The decision whether to accept or reject is the primary function of justices. It is quite impossible for us to say that they must or, indeed, ought to have come to any other conclusion in this case. Finally, note the words of s 3 (1) of the 1920 Act: '... the court may ... if after hearing the evidence it is satisfied of the justice of the application, make any such order ...' The court was not satisfied of the justice of this application, and that was the end of the matter. a

This case, however, raises an interesting and important question, which has been fully argued before us and on which we consider we ought to state our opinion. It is whether the court has in any event jurisdiction on such an application as this to make an order against a man who not only is not, but never has been, resident in England or Wales or within the ordinary jurisdiction of the court. b

It is at first sight a somewhat surprising proposition that a lady can come to Manchester (or elsewhere in England or Wales) from any of the many territories to which the 1920 Act extends (see Rayden on Divorce²), and obtain from the justices a provisional order against her husband, with whom she has always hitherto lived in that territory, and who has always been and still remains there. She may have arrived from Christmas Island, or the Falkland Islands, or the Niger Delta, not from the Isle of Man. If, as is possible, legislation is passed with a view to ratification by the United Kingdom of the United Nations Convention of 1956 on the recovery abroad of maintenance, the catchment area could become almost universal. The question does not appear ever to have been directly decided, and we understand that such orders have from time to time been made. c

The only textbook reference that we have been able to discover is in Bromley's Family Law³: 'A magistrates' court has no jurisdiction if the defendant resides outside the United Kingdom ...' *Macrae v Macrae*⁴ is cited as authority, but the text does not mention the 1920 Act, and it is true that except where the 1920 Act applies a maintenance order cannot be made where the defendant is resident outside the United Kingdom, since the summons cannot effectively be served on him. d

Section 3 of the 1920 Act is silent about jurisdiction, but it is plain that the 'application' for a 'maintenance order' therein referred to is an application made pursuant to the jurisdiction and powers of the court of summary jurisdiction to which the application is made. e

The 1920 Act enables such an order to be made against the defendant who is resident at one of the places outside the United Kingdom to which the 1920 Act has been extended, and who is absent when the order is made and the Summary Jurisdiction Acts are applied to those proceedings⁵. Accordingly, a complainant seeking a provisional order under s 3 of the 1920 Act must establish that the court to which the application is made has jurisdiction and power to make the order sought, and also that, being absent when the hearing takes place, the defendant is resident in one of the places to which the Act extends. The object of the 1920 Act is to provide reciprocal arrangements to enforce maintenance orders against persons resident in the places to which the Act has been extended, but living outside the territory of the court making the order. No provisions for the service of process on the defendant are included and, indeed, the court may only make the order 'in the absence' of the person against whom it is sought. f

The interests of the defendant are protected by the elaborate provisions of s 3 (2) (5) inclusive. It is unnecessary to set out these provisions in detail, and it is sufficient to emphasise that the order made in the first instance is provisional only, and of no effect unless and until confirmed by an order of the court in the place where the defendant resides. g a When the 1920 Act was passed, the jurisdiction of the court to which the application was to be made was governed by s 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 ('the 1895 Act'). This section restricted the jurisdiction to the petty sessional area (1) in which the husband had been convicted of a specified assault on the wife, or (2) in which the wife's cause of complaint against him (i.e. the matrimonial offence) wholly or partially arose. This remained the position until 16th December 1949

b when the Married Women (Maintenance) Act 1949 was passed ('the 1949 Act'). It was during this period and while the jurisdiction was thus restricted by the, as yet, unamended provisions of the 1895 Act, that the two cases of *Forsyth v Forsyth*⁶ and *Macrae v Macrae*⁷ were decided by the Court of Appeal. In each of these cases, however, the husband resided in Scotland, and therefore the 1920 Act did not apply, since he did not reside 'outside the United Kingdom' (see s 3 of the 1920 Act). Accord-c ingly, the Court of Appeal did not consider—nor is there any reference to—the provisions of the 1920 Act in the report of either case. In the Forsyth case⁶ there is only a possibility that the husband's desertion arose partly in England. In the Macrae case⁷ the husband certainly deserted the wife within the jurisdiction of the court which issued the summons. Somervell LJ said⁸:

d 'The fact that the desertion took place in England and that he was ordinarily resident in England up to a short time before does not seem to me to affect the matter. Ordinary residence... can be changed in a day.'

Therefore, at least in the Macrae case⁷, the requirements of s 4 of the 1895 Act as to jurisdiction were satisfied, because the cause of complaint initially arose within the jurisdiction of the English court. But the complainant failed in the Macrae case⁷
e on the basis of the principle stated in the Forsyth case⁶, namely, that unless the defendant was ordinarily resident or 'resident'—or possibly merely 'present'—in England when the summons was issued, there was no jurisdiction. In *Forsyth v Forsyth*⁹ Bucknill LJ cites with approval the following passage from Dicey's *Conflict of Laws*¹⁰:

f '... presence is enough, or in other words... residence means for the present purpose nothing more than such presence of the defendant as makes it possible to serve him with a writ or other process by which the action is commenced.'

Bucknill LJ in the Forsyth case¹¹, without deciding the point, was 'disposed to think' that the mere presence of the defendant within the jurisdiction when the summons is issued is sufficient. Of course, if there were no jurisdiction the use of mere procedural g provisions as to the issue and service of process cannot confer it. The result, therefore, of the *Forsyth*⁶ and *Macrae*⁷ cases, taken together, may properly be said to be that even though the cause of complaint may have arisen within the jurisdiction of the court, it has no power to adjudicate when the defendant is not resident—or possibly not even 'present'—within the jurisdiction when the summons was issued and served, and a fortiori when he is ordinarily resident outside it and has never resided h within it. In his statement of the principle in *Berkley v Thompson*¹² Lord Selborne LC recognised that a person resident abroad may be brought within the jurisdiction by 'special statute or legislation'. He said:

'... not only must there be a cause of action of which the tribunal can take cognizance, but there must be a defendant subject to the jurisdiction of that tribunal; and a person resident abroad, still more, ordinarily resident and domiciled abroad, and not brought by any special statute or legislation within the jurisdiction, is prima facie not subject to the process of a foreign Court—he must be found within the jurisdiction to be bound by it.’ a

Section 6 of the 1949 Act amended the 1895 Act by giving jurisdiction to the court of summary jurisdiction for the area in which the married woman or the husband ‘ordinarily resides’, as well as to the court within whose area the cause of complaint wholly or partially arose. This amendment would not, by itself, have affected the decisions in the *Forsyth*¹³ or *Macrae*¹⁴ cases, because the principle excluding jurisdiction in those cases was effective even where—as in the Macrae case¹⁴—the cause of complaint arose wholly within the jurisdiction. But s 1 of the Maintenance Orders Act 1950 expressly gave an English court jurisdiction to make a maintenance order against a man residing in Scotland or Northern Ireland provided the applicant wife resided in England and the parties last ordinarily resided together as man and wife in England. This statute certainly would have given jurisdiction in the *Macrae*¹⁴ case, but not in the Forsyth case¹³. b

In the light of the foregoing, we must now consider whether the magistrates’ court at Manchester had jurisdiction to entertain this application for maintenance, apart from the facts proved that the husband was resident in the Isle of Man and was absent at the date of the hearing. The jurisdiction is now to be found consolidated in s 1 (2) of the Matrimonial Proceedings (Magistrates’ Courts) Act 1960 (‘the 1960 Act’) which (in addition to the place where the husband was convicted of an assault on his wife) gives jurisdiction to the court for the petty sessional area where either the complainant or the defendant ‘ordinarily resides’, or in which the cause of complaint wholly or partly arose. The wife’s case undoubtedly was that at the material time she ‘ordinarily resided’ within the petty sessional area of the city of Manchester. It was assumed throughout the hearing of the appeal before us that there was evidence on which the magistrates could find that they had jurisdiction on the basis that the wife ‘ordinarily resided’ within their petty sessional area. It is not, therefore, necessary to consider the quality of her residence or the decisions dealing with that point, such as *Matalon v Matalon*¹⁵ or *Lowry v Lowry*¹⁶. The requirements of s 3 of the 1920 Act were also satisfied, because it was proved that the husband was resident outside the United Kingdom and in a part of Her Majesty’s dominions to which the Act extends—namely the Isle of Man—and was absent at the date of the hearing. Prima facie, therefore, all the conditions necessary to give the court jurisdiction were satisfied. No difficulties as to the service of process on an absent defendant, such as arose in the *Forsyth*¹³ or *Macrae*¹⁴ cases, existed because of the provisions of the 1920 Act. The crucial question is whether the terms of the 1920 Act, taken together with those of the 1960 Act, constitute (in Lord Selborne LC’s phrase¹⁷) a ‘special statute or legislation’ which bring the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court concerned, or whether some other essential requirements not expressed in the statute must also be satisfied. c

Clearly, unless the express terms of the 1920 Act are to be ignored, the conditions stated in the Forsyth case¹³ that the husband must be ordinarily resident or, at least, present in the jurisdiction where the summons was issued cannot apply—because the whole basis of the statute is that he is not only resident abroad but actually not present when the application is heard. Is a condition to be implied that the cause of complaint, e.g. the alleged cruelty or desertion, shall have wholly or partly d a arisen within the jurisdiction; that is in England or Wales? If so, then the 1949 Act must have been intended only to enable a wife, who had moved from one petty sessional area (e.g. Bristol) in which her cause of complaint arose to another (e.g. Manchester) to take out a summons in and have her case heard in Manchester. Before the 1920 Act was passed there was the essential condition arising from s 4 of the 1895 Act that the wife might—

b ‘apply to any court of summary jurisdiction acting within the city, borough, or petty sessional or other division or district, in which any such conviction has taken place, or in which the cause of complaint shall have wholly or partially arisen . . .’

c That was her sole remedy and means of enforcement. That was the only jurisdiction the magistrates possessed; and, of course, it follows that the cause of complaint must have arisen in England or Wales. However, from December 1949 up to the present time the jurisdiction has remained extended so as to include the petty sessional area in which the married woman or the husband ordinarily resides, irrespective of where the cause of complaint arose. Section 1 (2) of the 1960 Act is clearly disjunctive.

d No case was cited to us nor have we been able to discover any authority which decides the point whether it is an essential condition of the exercise of the power to make an order under s 3 of the 1920 Act that the cause of complaint shall have arisen wholly or partly within the petty sessional area of the court to which the application is made. But the point did arise and was considered by a Divisional Court of the King’s Bench, consisting of Lord Hewart CJ, Avory and Humphreys JJ in relation to the reciprocal South African legislation in *Re Wheat*¹⁸. In that case a wife resident in East London in South Africa in July 1931 obtained a provisional order for maintenance for herself against her husband, a doctor, then resident and domiciled in England, pursuant to a statute of the Legislature of the Union of South Africa, Act No 15 of 1923. This statute enacted reciprocal provisions to the English Act of 1920. The order was made on the ground of desertion. A metropolitan magistrate in November 1931 confirmed the provisional order (subject only to a reduction in the amount) pursuant to the powers given by s 4 of the 1920 Act. The husband appealed to the Divisional Court, inter alia, on the ground that it was an essential requirement of South African law to found jurisdiction that the husband’s desertion should be proved to have taken place in South Africa, and that there was no evidence of such desertion. The considered judgment of the court was delivered by Humphreys J, who said this¹⁹:

g ‘In the year 1923 the Legislature of the Union of South Africa enacted such reciprocal provisions by Act No. 15 of 1923 of the Statutes of South Africa, and s. 4 of that Act enables a magistrate’s court in the Union to which application is made for a maintenance order against a person resident in England to make, in the absence of that person, “any such order as it might have made if a summons had been duly served on that person and he had failed to appear at the hearing,” but provides that such order shall be provisional only and shall have no effect until confirmed by a competent court in England. This Act affords no guide as to the jurisdiction of a magistrate’s court to make a maintenance order in any particular case, and we are thrown back upon the language of Act No. 7 of 1895 to ascertain whether the order in this case is one which the court “might have made” under that Act.’

j The provisions of s 4 of the reciprocal South Africa Act 15 of 1923 appear to be similar in all relevant respects to s 3 of the 1920 Act, and likewise silent as to the jurisdiction to make the order for which application was made. Accordingly, the Divisional Court turned to the South Africa Statute No 7 of 1895, which gave power to a South African magistrate to make a maintenance order in the favour of a deserted wife. The relevant parts of this Act are set out in the report²⁰ and need not be repeated. By s 2 jurisdiction was given to the resident magistrate in the district in which the wife resided in these terms¹:

'When any husband unlawfully deserts his wife or leaves her without means of support . . . if complaint thereof be made on oath to the resident magistrate of the district in which such wife . . . shall . . . reside . . . such resident magistrate . . . [may initiate the procedure leading to the making of the order].'

The metropolitan magistrate's view on this point of jurisdiction and the Divisional Court's opinion thereon are stated in the following passage of the judgment²:

'Upon the third point the opinion of the learned magistrate is stated in para. 7 (d) of the case as follows: "That the jurisdiction given by Act No. 7 of 1895 is not in the district in which a husband deserts or leaves his wife destitute, but in the district in which the wife (who has previously been deserted or left destitute, whether in that district or elsewhere) resides at the time of making her complaint." This Court must not be taken to assent to that proposition of law in the form in which it is expressed, but in our judgment the decision of the learned magistrate may be supported on other grounds.'

The 'other grounds' on which the Divisional Court supported the decision of the metropolitan magistrate were based on a finding of fact and law that 'the wife was deserted and left without means of support in East London'; that is, within the area of the court in South Africa which made the order.

The Divisional Court were not considering the English Acts of 1920 or of 1895, nor is their decision a binding authority on the point we have to decide. If they had considered the point in its relation to English law, the only conclusion they could have reached was that it was an essential requirement that the desertion or other cause of complaint must have arisen wholly or partly within the area of the court making the order, because in 1931 that was the sole ground giving jurisdiction under the English 1895 Act (except the place of conviction of the husband for assault).

The cruelty alleged by the wife took place, if at all, in the Isle of Man, and the inception of the alleged constructive desertion also took place there. There was evidence which, if accepted, and taken together with the husband's letters, might have supported a finding that desertion being a continuing offence, also arose while the wife was in Manchester. This aspect of desertion is fully considered, together with some of the authorities in the judgment of the court in *Re Wheat*³. As stated earlier the point plainly does not arise for decision before us, but in deference to the arguments addressed to us, and in view of the importance of the issue, we have thought it right to express an opinion on it. We are of opinion that, provided the complainant wife satisfies s 1 (2) (a) of the 1960 Act by proving that she or her husband ordinarily resides within the petty sessional area for which the court acts, that court has jurisdiction, notwithstanding that the cause of complaint arises wholly outside the area of that court, and even outside England or Wales altogether. No authority requires us to hold otherwise. Section 1 (2) of the 1960 Act specifies alternative grounds on which jurisdiction may be based, and to imply any condition such as that suggested involves disregarding the terms of the Act. No aspect of public policy seems to us to demand a different approach. The defendant's interests are protected by the machinery of the 1920 Act. In the wider field of divorce law, once a court (usually, a but not always, the court of domicile of the parties) has jurisdiction, it has been a commonplace for a decree of dissolution of a marriage to be based on a finding of a matrimonial offence which took place wholly outside the territorial jurisdiction of the adjudicating court.

Finally, we find it difficult to think that when the legislature passed the 1960 Act it could have overlooked the interrelation of the 1920 Act with the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, which since 1949 had provided two distinct and alternative bases for jurisdiction. We recognise the force of a possible argument that when Parliament gave a court of summary jurisdiction power to adjudicate on the basis of the ordinary residence of the complainant or defendant, it was contemplated that the cause of complaint, though arising outside the petty sessional area of the court, at least arose within the territorial area of the United Kingdom. But, having regard to all the circumstances prevailing in 1960, including the long-standing provisions of the 1920 Act and the movements of population within the Commonwealth, we do not think that the courts should be astute to impose by implication a restriction which Parliament did not choose to express.

g Estate duty – Exemption and remission – Property which has borne duty on death of spouse – Settled property – Interest in expectancy – Duty paid on interest in expectancy on death of first spouse – Whether prior payment of duty on interest in expectancy qualifying for relief as payment in respect of settled property on death of surviving spouse – Finance Act 1894, s 5 (2) – Finance (1909-10) Act 1910, s 55 – Finance Act 1914, s 14, proviso (a).

h Under the terms of a settlement made in his will, R, who died on 25th April 1914, provided that his residuary estate was to be divided into four equal parts, each part to be held in trust for each of his four children subject to the proviso that the share bequeathed to each daughter should not vest in her absolutely but should be retained on trust to pay the income to her, and after her death to her husband; after the husband's death or remarriage, each share was to be held in trust for the children of each of R's daughters who should attain 21 or, if female, should earlier marry. K, the wife of C, was one of R's four children. C and K had three children, one of whom, a daughter, P, died in 1941 unmarried and intestate having attained the age of 21 years. On her death P's interest in expectancy of one-third of K's share under R's will passed in equal shares to C and K, each of whom, therefore, had a one-sixth interest in expectancy under the will of R. C died on 24th June 1963 and duty was paid in his estate on his half share in P's interest in expectancy in K's share under R's will. K died on 25th September 1965 and the question then arose whether one-sixth of her share under R's will, i.e. half of P's share in that share, was exempt from duty. It was contended by the executors of K that on the true construction of proviso (a) to s 14^a of the Finance Act 1914 (which preserved the relief from duty in respect of settled property contained in s 5 (2)^b of the Finance Act 1894 in cases where duty had been paid on the death of one of the parties to a marriage) the proviso applied where duty had been paid on an interest in expectancy in settled property since s 55^c of the Finance (1909-10) Act 1910, which excluded interests in expectancy from the ambit of s 5 (2) of the 1894 Act, had no application in the construction of s 14 of the 1914 Act and accordingly the relief under s 5 (2) was unaffected and therefore available in the present case by reason of the payment of duty in the estate of R.

Held—Since by the express provisions of the 1910 and 1914 Acts the relevant provisions of those Acts were to be construed together with the 1894 Act, it followed that s 14 of the 1914 Act was to be construed together with s 55 of the 1910 Act; accordingly the provision of s 55 of the 1910 Act to the effect that a payment of duty in respect of an interest in expectancy was not to be deemed to be a payment of duty in respect of settled property, had to be applied in the construction of proviso (a) to s 14 of the 1914 Act; since the duty paid on C's death on the one-sixth share was on an interest in expectancy, proviso (a) to s 14 of the 1914 Act was therefore inapplicable, and there was nothing to exclude or restrict the charge of duty on the death of K (see p 347 e to g, post).

c Section 55, so far as material, is set out at p 346 f and g, post

a directed his trustees to divide his residuary estate into four equal parts and to hold one of such parts for each of his four children, subject to the proviso that the share bequeathed in trust for each daughter should not vest in her absolutely but should be retained by his trustees on trust to pay the income thereof to her, and after her death to pay such income to her husband until he should marry again; and after his re-marriage or death, to hold the share in trust for the daughter's child or children

b who, being a son or sons, attained 21 or, being a daughter or daughters, attained 21 or married, and if more than one in equal shares; and there was a provision for accrual.

Herbert Edgar Reid died on 25th April 1914. He had four children, one of whom was Katherine, the wife of Sir Charles Henry Napier Bunbury. Sir Charles and Lady Bunbury had themselves three children, namely, Sir John William Napier Bunbury, Mrs Margaret Elinor Tomkin and Miss Pamela Bunbury. Pamela died unmarried and intestate on 20th October 1941, having attained the age of 21 years. On her death her father and mother, i.e. Sir Charles and Lady Bunbury, became entitled to her estate in equal shares. Her estate consisted entirely of her interest in expectancy under the will of Herbert Reid. She left no debts. Sir Charles died intestate on 24th June 1963. Letters of administration to his estate were granted to Sir John Bunbury and Mrs Tomkin. Lady Bunbury died on 25th September 1965. Probate of her will was granted to Sir John Bunbury and Mrs Tomkin.

After the deaths of Sir Charles and Lady Bunbury letters of administration to the estate of Pamela were granted to Sir John Bunbury and Mrs Tomkin. That was on 24th May 1967. Duty was paid in the estate of Sir Charles on his half share in Pamela's estate, which consisted of her interest in expectancy in Lady Bunbury's share under the will of Herbert Reid. Sir John Bunbury and Mr Oliver Ronald Smith are the present trustees of Herbert Reid's will. Lady Bunbury's share under the will of Herbert Reid amounts to £629,000. The question which has arisen is whether one-sixth of that share, i.e. half of Pamela's share in that share, is exempt from duty by reason of the duty paid in Sir Charles's estate in respect of his interest in Pamela's estate.

f On the present originating summons the plaintiffs are Sir John Bunbury, Mrs Tomkin and Oliver Smith. The defendants are the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The question raised by the summons is in these terms:

'That it may be determined whether, on the true construction of the Finance Act, 1894, and amending Acts and in the events which have happened, the exemption from estate duty in respect of settled property conferred by Section 5 (2) of the Finance Act, 1894, does, or does not, apply on the Deceased's death on the 25th September, 1965, to a moiety of the share of the Deceased's Settled Share of the residuary estate of Herbert Edgar Reid deceased which then passed into the estate of her deceased daughter Pamela, by reason of the payment of estate duty in respect of the estate of the said Herbert Edgar Reid deceased made on his death on the 25th April, 1914 and the payment of estate duty in respect of the estate of the Deceased's husband, Sir Charles Henry Napier Bunbury made on his death on the 24th June 1963.'

It will be necessary at this stage to refer to three statutory provisions and one decided case. Section 5 (2) of the Finance Act 1894 is in these terms:

'If Estate duty has already been paid in respect of any settled property since the date of the settlement, the Estate duty shall not . . . be payable in respect thereof, until the death of a person who was at the time of his death or had been at any time during the continuance of the settlement competent to dispose of such property . . .'

j

Duty having been paid on the death of Herbert Reid it is not in doubt that if this section had not been subsequently amended the exemption under it would have been available quite irrespective of the payment of duty in the estate of Sir Charles.

I must next refer to the decision of the House of Lords in *Inland Revenue Comrs v Priestley*¹. The headnote runs as follows:

“By a marriage settlement personal property was settled in trust for the husband for life, after his death for the wife for life, and after the death of the survivor for such persons as the wife by deed or will should appoint. The wife died, having exercised the power of appointment by will. Upon her death estate duty was paid under the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of her expectancy, upon the principal value of the settled property, the value of her husband’s life interest being deducted. Upon the husband’s death the Crown claimed estate duty again upon the principal value of the settled property. The settlement trustees paid the claim, but afterwards petitioned for a return of the amount, less the value of the husband’s life interest, alleging that on his death estate duty became payable (if at all) only on the value of his life interest:—Held, that estate duty having been paid upon the settled property since the date of the settlement, namely, upon the wife’s death, s. 5, sub-s. (2), exempted the settled property from estate duty until the death of a person who was at the time of his death or had been at any time during the continuance of the settlement competent to dispose of the property, and that the husband not being such a person, the trustees were entitled to a return of the amount for which they petitioned, and that if they had claimed the return of the whole sum they had paid upon the husband’s death they would have been entitled to it.”

I need not read the speeches in that case. It will be sufficient to say that if s 5 (2) had not been amended the payment of duty in the estate of Sir Charles would have afforded a second ground of exemption from duty.

The next statutory provision is s 55 of the Finance (1909-10) Act 1910. That section, so far as material, provides as follows:

‘For the purpose of any claim to relief from estate duty under subsection (2) of section five . . . of the principal Act, in the case of persons dying on or after the thirtieth day of April nineteen hundred and nine, payment of or liability to duty, whether the payment was made or the liability attached before, on, or after that date, shall not be deemed to be a payment of or liability to duty in respect of settled property if the payment was made or the liability attached in respect of an interest in expectancy in any property on the death of a person other than the settlor.’

The negative deeming provision in that section disqualifies payment of duty on an interest in expectancy as a ground of exemption. Otherwise the section leaves intact the exception in s 5 (2) of the 1894 Act. Section 96 (3) of the 1910 Act provides that Part III of the Act, which includes s 55, shall be construed together with the 1894 Act.

Finally, one comes to s 14 of the Finance Act 1914. That section, so far as material, provides as follows:

‘Any relief from the payment of estate duty given by subsection (2) of section five, or by subsection (1) of section twenty-one of the Finance Act, 1894 (which relate to settled property) . . . shall cease in the case of any person dying after the fifteenth day of August, nineteen hundred and fourteen . . . Provided that —(a) nothing in this section shall affect the relief given by the above-mentioned provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, in cases where, before or after the passing of this Act, estate duty has been paid . . . or [is] payable upon the death of one

- a of the parties to a marriage, so far as respects the payment of estate duty on the death of the other party to the marriage . . .'

That section in the first place excludes any relief afforded by s 5 (2) of the 1894 Act. Then, the proviso saves that relief in the specified cases, namely, cases where estate duty has been paid on the death of one of the parties to a marriage, so far as respects the payment of estate duty on the death of the other party to the marriage. That is the familiar exemption habitually applied where property is settled in such a way that duty is payable on the first death of the one spouse, and the surviving spouse is not competent to dispose of it. Section 18 of the 1914 Act provides that Part III of that Act, which includes s 14, shall be construed together with the 1894 Act.

- b Counsel for the plaintiffs accepted that the expression in the proviso to s 14 'estate duty has been paid' must mean 'estate duty has been paid in respect of the settled property'. Counsel's contention on the effect of s 14 may be summarised as follows: 'Proviso (a) to s 14 must be construed according to the ordinary use of language, as explained in the Priestley case². The proviso therefore applies where duty has been paid on the death of one spouse on an interest in expectancy in the settled property. At this stage, s 55 of the 1910 Act has no application. Then one is thrown back on s 5 (2) of the 1894 Act, the relief under which is unaffected. This relief is available here
- c by reason of the payment of duty in the estate of Herbert Reid. At this stage s 55 of the 1910 Act would admittedly be applicable to disqualify the duty paid in the estate of Sir Charles, but the payment in the estate of Herbert Reid makes it unnecessary to have recourse to that payment.' If it were indeed legitimate thus to disregard s 55 of the 1910 Act in the construction of proviso (a) to s 14 of the 1914 Act, the rest of the argument would, it seems to me, be valid; but I do not think that it is legitimate thus to disregard s 55.

- By the express statutory provisions to which I have referred in the 1910 Act and the 1914 Act, the relevant parts of the 1894 Act, the 1910 Act, and the 1914 Act must be construed together. Section 5 (2) of the 1894 Act, s 55 of the 1910 Act and s 14 of the 1914 Act are all concerned with the same subject-matter, namely, relief from duty in respect of settled property. It necessarily follows that s 14 of the 1914 Act
- f must be construed not only together with s 5 (2) of the 1894 Act, but also with s 55 of the 1910 Act. Once this is accepted it seems to me to follow inescapably that the negative deeming provision in s 55 must be applied in the construction of proviso (a) to s 14 and thus disqualifies the payment of duty on an interest in expectancy from the ambit of the cases where duty has been paid on the death of one of the parties to a marriage for the purpose of that proviso. I find it impossible to construe the proviso (a) in s 14 without regard to s 55. So, in the present case proviso (a) is inapplicable and there is nothing to exclude or restrict the charge of duty on the death of Lady Bunbury.

- The issue by common consent falls within a narrow compass; i e in effect whether in construing proviso (a) to s 14 of the 1914 Act it is or is not proper to take into account the negative deeming provision in s 55 of the 1910 Act. It is not possible to elaborate
- h the point. I am informed that the estate duty office has until recently accepted that exemption from duty is available in comparable cases. It is not, however, contended that this practice of the estate duty office in any way invalidates the contention now advanced by the Crown.

- An alternative contention was advanced by counsel for the Crown, i e that inasmuch as the relevant asset in the estate of Sir Charles at the date of his death was not a share in the settled property in specie but an interest in the unadministered estate of Pamela, which included that share, the payment of duty on his death was, in any event, not a payment in respect of the settled property. There was considerable argument on this point and I was referred to a number of cases of high authority. This point raises an issue of considerably wider importance than that raised by the first point, and since my decision on the first point concludes this case I think it better not to express any conclusion obiter on the second point. a

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

STEPHENSON LJ, THOMPSON AND BRIDGE JJ

28th OCTOBER, 23rd NOVEMBER 1971 c

Criminal law – Assisting offender – Indictment – Form of indictment – Necessity for count to specify particular offence committed by principal offender – Criminal Law Act 1967, s 4 (1), (3).

Criminal law – Indictment – Uncertainty or ambiguity – Assisting offender – Principal offender charged with murder – Possibility of conviction of manslaughter – Charge against assistant alleging principal offender guilty of ‘unlawful killing’ – Irregularity of no practical importance – Conviction of principal offender of murder making clear gravity of assistant’s offence – No miscarriage of justice – Criminal Law Act 1967, ss 4 (1), (3), 6 (3). d

P and W stabbed C to death, K being present at the time but taking no part in the killing. The appellant, knowing what had happened, provided or arranged a hideout for P and K. P, W and K were indicted for the murder of C. The appellant was charged in count 2 of the indictment with contravening s 4 (1)^a of the Criminal Law Act 1967, the particulars of the count alleging that he ‘without lawful authority or reasonable excuse . . . arranged for [P] and [K] to stay in a flat with intent to impede their apprehension for the arrestable offence of murder which they had then committed’, the appellant then knowing or believing them to be guilty of the said offence. At the end of the prosecution case K was acquitted on the judge’s direction, and count 2 was amended by deleting references to K. P’s defence was that he had been provoked by C and the jury were invited to return a verdict of manslaughter. In consequence counsel for the Crown sought, and was given leave, to amend count 2 by substituting ‘unlawful killing’ for ‘murder’. In due course P was convicted of murder and the appellant was convicted on count 2. The appellant appealed against conviction on the ground that count 2, as amended, was defective in that there was no arrestable offence of unlawful killing known to the law, and that it was essential when charging an offence under s 4 (1) of the 1967 Act to specify correctly the particular offence actually committed by the person whom the accused had assisted. e

Held – (i) Although under s 4 (1) it mattered not that the assistant did not know the nature of the other person’s offence, it was nevertheless necessary to specify in the charge the particular offence committed so that the court’s jurisdiction to entertain it and the maximum punishment to which the accused would be liable under s 4 (3)^b f

^b Section 4 (3), so far as material, provides: ‘A person committing an offence under subsection (1) above with intent to impede another person’s apprehension or prosecution shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment according to the gravity of the other person’s offence, as follows:—(a) if that offence is one for which the sentence is fixed by law, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than ten years; (b) if it is one for which a person (not previously convicted) may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of fourteen years, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than seven years . . .’ j a might be known at the outset; accordingly, count 2, as amended, was defective (see p 350 j to p 351 c, post).

(ii) No amendment of count 2 was in fact necessary at the trial since, by virtue of s 6 (3)^c of the 1967 Act, the jury could have been properly directed to convict the appellant if satisfied (a) that P was guilty of murder or manslaughter; (b) that the appellant knew or believed that P was guilty of one or other of those offences or of any arrestable offence, and (c) that the appellant had assisted P with intent to impede his apprehension (see p 351 d f and g, post).

b (iii) The vice of uncertainty or ambiguity in the amended count was of no practical importance, because the jury's verdict that P was guilty of murder made clear, for the purposes of s 4 (3) of the 1967 Act, the scale of gravity of the appellant's offence of assisting him; the appellant was in no way prejudiced by the circumstance that the route to his conviction was technically a deviation; the correct route, had it been followed, would inevitably have led to the same result; accordingly there had been no miscarriage of justice and the appeal would be dismissed (see p 351 g and h, post).

c Per Curiam. A count in an indictment particularising an offence under s 4 (1) of the 1967 Act will be sufficient if it states that the other person has committed a specified arrestable offence and that the accused, knowing or believing him to be guilty of that or some other arrestable offence, has without lawful authority or reasonable excuse done the act particularised with intent to impede the other person's apprehension or prosecution (see p 352 b, post).

Appeal

g On 15th February 1971 at the Central Criminal Court before Thesiger J and a jury the appellant, Martin Meldrum Morgan, was convicted on count 2 of an indictment charging that he without lawful authority or reasonable excuse arranged for one Phillips (charged on count 1 with murder) and a Miss Kiley (also charged with the same murder) to stay in a flat 'with intent to impede their apprehension for the arrestable offence of murder which they had then committed, [the appellant] knowing or believing them to be guilty of the said arrestable offence or some other arrestable offence'. The appellant pleaded guilty to a second indictment charging him with burglary (count 1) and robbery (count 3). He was sentenced to four years' imprisonment on the first indictment, to three years on the burglary count and to seven years on the robbery count, all the sentences to run consecutively, making 14 years' imprisonment in all. The appellant appealed against his conviction on count 2 of the first indictment. At the end of the prosecution case, the trial judge had directed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty of murder in respect of Miss Kiley, and the indictment was amended to delete Miss Kiley's name from it. Leave was also given on an application by counsel for the Crown to amend count 2 by substituting 'unlawful killing' for 'murder'. The appellant's ground of appeal on this count was that, as amended, it was defective, in that there was no arrestable offence of 'unlawful killing' known to the law and that in the circumstances the count disclosed no offence. He also appealed generally against sentence. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Cur adv vult

23rd November. BRIDGE J read the judgment of the court at the invitation of Stephenson LJ. The appellant was convicted at the Central Criminal Court on 15th February 1971 of an offence under s 4 (1) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 which provides:

'Where a person has committed an arrestable offence, any other person who, knowing or believing him to be guilty of the offence or of some other arrestable offence, does without lawful authority or reasonable excuse any act with intent to impede his apprehension or prosecution shall be guilty of an offence.'

Three co-accused, Phillips, Walsh and Kiley, were indicted for the murder of one Cunningham. The appellant was charged with the offence under s 4 of the 1967 Act in a second count of the indictment, the particulars alleging that he—

'without lawful authority or reasonable excuse... arranged for Phillips and Kiley to stay in a flat with intent to impede their apprehension for the arrestable offence of murder which they had then committed.'

the appellant then knowing or believing them to be guilty of the said arrestable offence.

Phillips and Walsh stabbed Cunningham to death at his flat. Kiley was present but took no part in the killing. The appellant with knowledge of what had happened provided or arranged a hideout for Phillips and Kiley where the police eventually found them. At the close of the case for the prosecution Kiley was acquitted by direction of the judge and at some time count 2 against the appellant was consequentially amended by deleting the reference to Kiley. Phillips's defence was that he had been provoked by Cunningham and the jury were invited on his behalf to return a verdict of manslaughter. In the light of this, counsel for the Crown, before the defence of the appellant was presented, proposed to amend count 2. He apprehended that if the count stood unamended and Phillips was convicted of manslaughter, or conversely if the count was amended to refer to Phillips's offence as manslaughter and Phillips was then convicted of murder, it might be technically impossible in either case to convict the appellant. He sought escape from this dilemma by proposing to amend the particulars by substituting 'unlawful killing' for 'murder', and leave to make this amendment was granted. In the circumstances the phrase 'unlawful killing' was no doubt intended and understood as a convenient shorthand to cover murder or manslaughter. In due course Phillips was, in fact, convicted of murder and the appellant was convicted on count 2. The appellant now appeals against that conviction by leave of the full court on the ground that count 2 as amended was defective 'in that there is no arrestable offence of "unlawful killing" known to the law'.

The submission made on behalf of the appellant is that it is essential when charging an offence under s 4 (1) of the 1967 Act to specify correctly the particular offence actually committed by the person whom the accused has assisted. It is common ground that under the old law when charging an accessory after the fact to felony it was necessary to specify both the particular felony which had been committed and that this was known to the accessory. The Act clearly changes the law in the latter respect. Under s 4 (1) it matters not that the assistant does not know the nature of the other person's offence. But we see nothing in the language of the subsection to suggest an intention to change the law so that it should no longer be a necessary to specify the particular offence committed. In any event, the later provisions of s 4, in our judgment, really put the matter beyond doubt. Under s 4 (3) a scale of maximum penalties is laid down for offences under sub-s (1), which varies 'according to the gravity of the other person's offence'. Thus, for example, to assist a murderer carries a maximum of ten years' imprisonment; to assist a manslaughterer a maximum of only seven years. Again, by s 4 (5) it is the character of the offence committed by the person who receives assistance which determines whether or not the assistant may be tried summarily. It must follow that the actual offence needs to be specified in the charge so that the court's jurisdiction to entertain it and the maximum punishment to which the accused will be liable on conviction may be known at the outset. Accordingly, counsel for the appellant makes good his complaint that count 2 as amended was defective. The next question is whether this irregularity led to any miscarriage of justice.

b We have heard argument as to what steps in relation to the appellant ought to have been taken to cover the contingency that Phillips might be convicted of either murder or manslaughter. Counsel for the appellant at one stage submitted that the contingency could only be met by alternative counts. He said that at the stage of this trial when the question arose, it was too late to amend the indictment to introduce a new count against the appellant. In the end, however, counsel on both sides before us have accepted that in truth no amendment was necessary, because the situation was covered by s 6 (3) of the 1967 Act, which provides, so far as material:

c 'Where, on a person's trial on indictment for any offence except treason or murder, the jury find him not guilty of the offence specifically charged in the indictment, but the allegations in the indictment amount to or include (expressly or by implication) an allegation of another offence falling within the jurisdiction of the court of trial, the jury may find him guilty of that other offence . . .'

e This language is applicable to the situation envisaged because the allegation 'A having killed B with intent (murder) you, X, assisted A' obviously includes the allegation 'A having killed B without intent (manslaughter), you, X, assisted A'.

f Accordingly, if the court had been referred to s 6 (3) instead of being asked to allow the offending amendment, the jury could have been properly directed to convict the appellant, if satisfied (1) that Phillips was guilty of murder or manslaughter; (2) that the appellant knew or believed that Phillips was guilty of one or other of those offences or of any other arrestable offence, and (3) that the appellant assisted Phillips with intent to impede his apprehension. In fact, the directions given by the learned judge to the jury in relation to count 2 as amended were in substance either to that effect or (insofar as they differed) to an effect more favourable to the appellant. The vice of uncertainty or ambiguity in the amended count was of no practical consequence, because the jury's verdict that Phillips was guilty of murder on the first count made clear for the purposes of s 4 (3) the scale of gravity of the appellant's offence of assisting him. The appellant was in no way prejudiced by the circumstance that the route to his conviction was technically a deviation. The correct route, had it been followed, would inevitably have led to the same result. In our judgment there was no miscarriage of justice. We uphold the conviction.

g We wish to refer to a further submission made by counsel for the appellant. He says that in any case under s 4 (1) the court must know before passing sentence not only what offence was committed by the person assisted, but also what the assistant knew or believed it to be; and to this end, he submits, the jury must be asked for a special verdict. We cannot accept this. It appears to us that the deliberate policy of the legislature embodied in s 4 is that those who assist fugitives from justice act at their peril. The graver the fugitive's offence the heavier is the punishment to which the assistant renders himself liable irrespective of his state of knowledge. We do not, of course, mean to imply that the state of mind of the accused may not be a material factor in mitigation or that the court might not in an exceptional case think it useful to invite the jury to return a special verdict on the point. But this cannot be the norm and it was wholly unnecessary in the present case. a

It is fair to add, however, that counsel for the appellant's submission on this point derives some support from the actual form of the indictment, which, by alleging that the appellant acted with intent to impede Phillips's apprehension 'for the arrestable offence of murder', appeared to make the appellant's knowledge of the nature of the offence material. This allegation went beyond what was necessary to prove an offence under the subsection. A count in an indictment particularising an offence under s 4 (1) will be sufficient if it states that the other person has committed a specified arrestable offence and that the accused, knowing or believing him to be guilty of that or some other arrestable offence, has without lawful authority or reasonable excuse done the act particularised with intent to impede the other person's apprehension or prosecution. For the reasons stated earlier in this judgment, the appeal against conviction is dismissed. b

[The court then heard submissions on appeal against sentence.]

STEPHENSON LJ delivered the judgment of the court on sentence. The appeal of this appellant against conviction having been dismissed, we now have to consider whether the appeal against sentence should be allowed, and we think it should. d The sentences passed on this appellant were four years for the offence of assisting two villains who were convicted of murder; three years for burglary, and seven years for robbery, all consecutive. In passing that total of 14 years on this 19 year old appellant, the judge said:

'... I simply pass the appropriate sentence for each of the three offences which, in my view, should be consecutive sentences because each offence followed upon but was independent of the other. The sentence on the count of the indictment relating to the theft in Sussex of weapons is three years' imprisonment, the sentence for going and taking part in the armed robbery afterwards is seven years' imprisonment, consecutive, and the sentence for trying to hide two brutal murderers is four years' imprisonment. They will be consecutive sentences, making fourteen years...' e

Counsel for the appellant has stressed on us the youth of this appellant, the fact that he comes from a home where his brothers, much older than himself, have been involved in serious trouble with the criminal law, and his statement that all he was doing as regards the first offence was helping a friend or friends. This court does not wish to go again into the facts of the offences. Suffice it to say that the offences of burglary and robbery were grave offences, and this court cannot do other than take a very serious view in these days. Of the offence of assisting a murderer or murderers to avoid apprehension, even if friendship is the principal motive, this court finds it impossible to thwart the logic of the trial judge. Looked at logically, this court thinks that of these sentences, each is individually right and ought to be made consecutive. But bearing in mind the matters which have been urged on us by counsel for the appellant, in particular the youth of the appellant, this court thinks that the right course is to make the sentences for the burglary and robbery concurrent, but consecutive to the sentence of four years for the offence of assisting the murderers, with the result that the total period of the appellant's imprisonment will be reduced from 14 to what is still a long sentence, but a long sentence for three very serious crimes, a sentence of 11 years' imprisonment. The appeal against sentence will be allowed to that extent. g

Criminal law – Forcible entry – No intention to occupy premises – Whether intention to occupy an essential element of offence – Forcible Entry Act 1381.

Appeals

Raymond Brittain, Derek Brittain and Charles Trevor Henderson appealed against their conviction on 2nd February 1971 at Maidstone Assizes of forcible entry contrary to the Forcible Entry Act 1381. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

M Gale for the appellants.

K T Simpson for the Crown.

CAIRNS LJ delivered the judgment of the court. On 2nd February 1971 at Maidstone Assizes the three appellants, Raymond Brittain, Derek Brittain and Charles Trevor Henderson, together with a man called Day, were convicted of forcible entry contrary to the Forcible Entry Act 1381. The three appellants were sentenced by John Stephenson J to nine months' imprisonment in respect of the forcible entry. By leave of the single judge they appeal against conviction.

The ground on which it is contended that they were wrongly convicted of that crime is that it is said that here, although there was an entry by the appellants, and although the entry was made by force, it was not made with the intention of entering into occupation of the premises. It was contended at the trial, and the contention has been renewed in this court, that the offence of forcible entry under the Act has as one essential element in it the intention to enter into occupation of the premises.

j

The circumstances were these. A Mr and Mrs Brooker lived in a house in Gillingham, Kent. On the night of 31st October 1970 they were giving a bottle party there.

^a The Act is set out at p 354 d, post

The three appellants and Mr Day went to the house with the intention of joining the party. They apparently thought that one of the Brittaines had been invited and that possibly Mr Day also might have been invited. Raymond Brittain carried some sort of container and at least one other man had a pint mug with him. On arrival at the house they were refused admission by Mr and Mrs Brooker. They took that badly and, having momentarily withdrawn using obscenities and abuse, one of them threw a pint mug through a window and they then tried to rush into the house, the door of which had been opened after the noise of the window breaking had been heard. When inside they were met by a large force of guests. a

A submission of no case was made and rejected by the trial judge. Insofar as this was a submission on the facts, there is no appeal on it because, as has already been indicated, it is conceded that there was an entry into the premises in the sense that the three appellants, in fact, went over the threshold of them and that that entry was effected by force. But the argument is that although the Act does not say anything about an intention to occupy, nevertheless it must be taken that at the time of the passing of the Act entry meant entry with a view to going into occupation and that the statute has been interpreted in that way ever since. b

‘... None from henceforth make any entry into any lands or tenements, but in case where entry is given by the law; and in such cases not with strong hand, nor with multitude of people, but only in peaceable and easy manner. And if any man from henceforth do the contrary, and thereof be duly convicted, he shall be punished by imprisonment . . .’ c

Certainly on the face of it unless the word ‘entry’ can be given a meaning other than its ordinary meaning, the section is prohibiting not merely forcible entry with the intention of going into occupation but any forcible entry. Is there any reason to suppose that the word ‘entry’ was intended to be construed in the restricted way contended for on behalf of the appellants here? This court can see no possible reason why it should be. d

The common law forbade forcible entry by people who were not entitled to enter. The weakness of the common law was that the peace might be broken by people who were entitled to enter going in with force and terror. The Act was passed, therefore, to include, as its terms indicate, both the case of persons who had no lawful right to enter and those who had, and, in the view of this court, the intention of the Act was to prevent breaches of the peace in the case of forcible entry whether or not the person entering had a right to enter peaceably and that it was quite immaterial whether it was the intention to occupy or not. e

The strongest point that can be made by counsel for the appellants, who has argued the case most persuasively, is that from 1381 to 1971 no case is to be found in the reports in which anybody has been convicted of forcible entry when he has not apparently entered with the intention of occupying. In the great majority of cases what has actually happened is that the person entering has by force expelled the original occupier and taken up occupation himself. It is conceded by counsel on behalf of the appellants that the intention to expel or an actual expulsion of the occupier is not a necessary ingredient of the offence. For that proposition it is sufficient, since it is conceded by the appellants, to refer to Archbold¹ which sets out the proposition that expulsion is not a necessary element of the offence. A form of indictment containing these particulars of offence is set out²: f

‘A B, on the—day of—, in the county of—, with many other persons unknown, made a forcible entry upon the freehold land of J N, of which J N was in occupation, and expelled him from the possession thereof.’ g a It being conceded that the expulsion is not a necessary element, there is no indication in that form of indictment of any necessity to show an intention that the accused person means to go into occupation.

b In the authorities that the court has looked at the matter that was normally being discussed was whether there was such a degree of force as constituted forcible entry, never the question whether the defendant intended to go into occupation. Thus in *R v Smyth*³ the person who was charged with forcible entry was a married woman who had entered her husband's house. She contended that she could not be guilty because a wife could not be a trespasser in her husband's house. Lord Tenterden CJ in summing up said⁴:

c 'An indictment for a forcible entry cannot be supported by evidence of a mere trespass, but there must be proof of such force, or at least such a shew of force, as is calculated to prevent any resistance.'

Similarly in *Russell*⁵ that same proposition is repeated that mere trespass is not sufficient to constitute a forcible entry: there must in addition be a show of force. To quote Russell:

d '... whether he causes such a terror by carrying with him an unusual number of servants, or by arming himself in such a manner as plainly indicates a design to back his pretensions by force, or by actually threatening to kill, maim or beat those who shall continue in possession, or by giving out such speeches as plainly imply a purpose of using force against those who shall make any resistance.'

e Nowhere is there any suggestion that if those elements are present the entry will be deemed not to be a forcible entry unless there is an intention to occupy. One further sentence may be quoted from *Russell*⁶: 'It is a forcible entry for a man to enter by force to distrain for arrears of rent . . .' If that is right (and we think it is) it is one example of a person entering otherwise than with the intention of occupying.

f This court can see no reason why the Act should not apply in the case of persons who enter by force for the purpose of seeking to attend a party on the premises, whether indeed they have been invited to it or not. The matter was dealt with by John Stephenson J, when the submission was made to him in the court below, in one sentence which this court adopts. He said:

g 'The authorities cited to me show the Act in operation in cases where there was an assertion of right and an intention either to gain possession or to resist the resumption of possession, but I see no reason why I should limit the words of the Act to such cases, and good reason in this day and age why I should give the words their plain meaning.'

For these reasons the appeal against conviction is dismissed.

h Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused but the court certified under s 33 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 that a point of law of general public importance was involved, i.e. whether on a count laid under the Forcible Entry Act 1381, the Crown must prove as an essential element of the charge that the defendant occupied or intended to occupy the premises.

Owen v Burden (Inspector of Taxes)

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SALMON, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJJ

20th OCTOBER 1971

Income tax – Deductions in computing profits – Expenses incurred ‘wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of . . . duties’ – Conference expenses – County surveyor – Attendance at conference – By-pass scheme proposed by county council – Surveyor attending international conference abroad in hope of obtaining first class opinion on merits of scheme – Attendance during period of annual leave and without obtaining authority of county council – Whether expense of attending conference necessarily incurred in performance of his duties – Income Tax Act 1952, Sch 9, r 7.

The taxpayer was an engineer and the county surveyor for Denbighshire. He prepared an alternative scheme to that of Flintshire County Council for the construction of a by-pass for Bangor-on-Dee partly in Denbighshire and partly in Flintshire. His scheme involved deflecting the River Dee away from the by-pass instead of constructing a bridge over the river. He considered that his scheme would be cheaper and avoid the flooding of the Denbighshire side of the by-pass resulting from the Flintshire scheme. His scheme was supported by Denbighshire County Council, but the Flintshire scheme was adhered to by Flintshire County Council and preferred by the river authority and by the Secretary of State for Wales. Without obtaining special leave or the authority of his county council, the taxpayer attended on his own initiative and during his ordinary period of annual leave a world road conference in Tokyo, in the hope of obtaining an independent first class opinion on whether his scheme was preferable, from delegates from all over the world with wide experience of bridge building. In computing his income under Sch E for income tax purposes he claimed to be entitled to deduct from his salary as expenses under r 7 of Sch 9^a to the Income Tax Act 1952 the cost of attending the conference.

Held – The taxpayer was not entitled to deduct the cost of attending the conference because, even though advantages accrued to his employers from the expenditure, it was impossible to say that the expenses were necessarily incurred in the performance of his duties within r 7 of Sch 9 to the 1952 Act; it was not necessary for him to undertake the journey for the purpose of the office he was occupying (see p 358 e to g and j and p 359 a, post).

For 1970-71 and subsequent years of assessment, r 7 of Sch 9 to the Income Tax Act 1952 has been repealed, and replaced by s 189 (1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

Appeal

The taxpayer, Caradoc Morris Owen, appealed to the General Commissioners of Income Tax for Ruthin against an assessment to income tax under Sch E to the Income Tax Act 1952 made on him for 1967-68 on remuneration as the county surveyor for Denbigh, on the ground that an allowance had not been given in respect of certain expenses incurred by him in a visit to the Far East to attend a world road congress.

^a Schedule 9, r 7, is set out at p 358 c, post

- a* The question for determination was whether those expenses were allowable deductions under 17 of Sch 9 to the Income Tax Act 1952 as money expended by the taxpayer wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of his duties as county surveyor. The commissioners were not satisfied that the expenses claimed had been incurred wholly necessarily and exclusively in the performance of the taxpayer's duties and they therefore granted no allowance in respect of the expenses and confirmed the assessment. On 23rd March 1971 Plowman J dismissed the taxpayer's appeal by way of case stated against that decision. The taxpayer appealed to the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of Salmon LJ.
- b*

The taxpayer appeared in person.

Sir George Honeyman QC and P W Medd for the Crown.

- c* SALMON LJ. The appellant taxpayer is an engineer. He holds and has held for many years the office of county surveyor for the county of Denbighshire. In 1966 a by-pass scheme for Bangor-on-Dee was put forward by Flintshire County Council. This scheme involved a by-pass which would have been constructed partly in Flintshire and partly in Denbighshire. The taxpayer tells us, and we of course accept, that about half the by-pass would have been in the one county and half in the other.
- d* The scheme put forward by Flintshire County Council involved carrying the by-pass over the River Dee by means of a bridge. Apparently that scheme received the approval of the Secretary of State for Wales. Its estimated cost was originally £400,000. It was later reduced to £300,000. The taxpayer took the view that this scheme could be vastly improved on. There is no doubt that he genuinely held that view and for all I know he was absolutely right. The improvement, as he saw it, which should be effected was that the bridge carrying the by-pass should not be in the river but that the river should be diverted so that it was directed away from the by-pass. The advantages which he saw for his scheme were, first, that it would be much cheaper than the other scheme to which I have referred and, secondly, that the other scheme would have resulted in a good deal of flooding on the Denbighshire side of the by-pass whereas his scheme would avoid that flooding. Denbighshire County Council agreed with their surveyor and apparently favoured his scheme. However Flintshire County Council appear to have remained adamant in favour of their scheme which also appears to have been preferred by the river authority and the Welsh Office who were both naturally also concerned.
- f*

- Nothing had been finally decided by the autumn of 1967. The taxpayer discovered that a world road conference was to be held in Tokyo from 1st November until 23rd November 1967. He believed, and no one doubts that he genuinely believed, that it would be very much in the interests of all concerned if he were to attend that conference. The reasons for his belief were that there were likely to be delegates there from all over the world with wide experience of building bridges such as the bridge which would be built as part of the Bangor by-pass. He considered that he would there in Tokyo be able to get a first class opinion and an entirely independent opinion whether his views about how the bridge should be constructed were to be preferred to those of Flintshire County Council. It is to be observed that he was not going there to get any opinion or information for the purpose of persuading his own county council because they had already expressed their agreement with his views. He no doubt thought that, if he could return armed with the opinion which he believed that he could obtain, then Flintshire County Council, the river authority and the Welsh Office would agree that the construction should take place in accordance with his own ideas.
- g*
- h*
- j*

The taxpayer did not ask for special leave to go to Tokyo. He had not in that year in any event availed himself of his leave and there was a sufficient period of leave due to him to enable him to go to Tokyo for the necessary period. He did not, perhaps unfortunately, go to his county council and ask them for authority to go to Tokyo and incur the expenses of that journey. Had he obtained their authority no doubt they would have paid for the expedition. Still less was he ordered or requested by his county council to go to Tokyo. It is difficult to see how one could fault the view that he went of his own volition. I would like to emphasise that no one doubts his motives. They were of the highest. No one doubts that it may well be that his journey to Tokyo would bring advantages to his employers because it would increase his general knowledge and experience. That however, unfortunately for him, is not the test whether the cost of the expedition can be deducted for the purpose of tax.

The statutory language to be considered is very well known and has stood for many, many years. It appears in r 7 of Sch 9 to the Income Tax Act 1952, and applies to allowances under Sch E. The paragraph provides as follows:

'If the holder of an office or employment of profit is necessarily obliged to incur and defray out of the emoluments thereof the expenses of travelling in the performance of the duties of the office or employment, or of keeping and maintaining a horse to enable him to perform the same, or otherwise to expend money wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of the said duties, there may be deducted from the emoluments to be assessed the expenses so necessarily incurred and defrayed.'

That passage has been considered times without number. It has been frequently criticised but the legislature has always retained it and the courts have never departed from the view that they were compelled to apply this strict language used by the legislature.

The General Commissioners of Income Tax came to the conclusion that the taxpayer had not satisfied them that the expenses that he claimed had been incurred wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of his duties. He appealed against that decision to Plowman J who, in a short and lucid judgment, explained the reasons why it was impossible to differ from the commissioners. It is really only out of respect for the courteous, interesting and skilful argument presented by the taxpayer that I have not contented myself by saying that I agree with the judgment of Plowman J and cannot improve on it by substituting any words of my own.

I am afraid that, sympathetic as I am to the taxpayer, it would be quite impossible to say that, on the facts as found, the expenses which he is claiming were necessarily incurred in the performance of his duties. He was no doubt doing his best, and in a broad sense his duty, but it was not necessary for him to incur the expenses of this journey for the purpose of the office he was occupying. For those reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

BUCKLEY LJ. I agree. The point before us is a very short one. It can be stated as being whether the taxpayer as county surveyor for the county of Denbigh was necessarily obliged to incur the expenditure of the £485 in question as travelling expenses in the performance of his duties in that office or whether he was necessarily obliged otherwise to spend the money wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of his duties. Although there were no doubt advantages in the taxpayer's attending the world road conference in Tokyo on 1st November 1967 to 23rd November 1967 in which respect the expenditure was incurred, and advantages which accrued for the benefit of his employers as well as to him personally, I do not feel able to see how on the facts as found in the case it could be said that he was necessarily obliged to undertake this journey or to attend this conference or that the money was necessarily expended in the performance of his duties. Moreover, I think it would be difficult on the facts stated in the case to reach the conclusion that the expenditure was incurred wholly and exclusively in the performance of his duties.

Like Salmon LJ, I find no grounds for criticising the judgment of the learned judge

- a in any respect, or the decision of the commissioners, and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ORR LJ. I agree.

RUSSELL, PHILLIMORE AND BUCKLEY LJJ
2nd, 3rd DECEMBER 1971

- e Administration of estates – Order of application of assets – Judgment creditor obtaining garnishee order nisi against solicitors of executrix – Doubt whether estate solvent – Danger of preferring judgment creditor to other creditors of estate – Procedure – Payment of amount of judgment debt into court – Garnishee order not to be made absolute pending outcome of enquiry to determine whether estate solvent.

- f The plaintiff was owed money by O in respect of the building of a house. O died and his widow was granted probate of his will. The plaintiff sued the widow as executrix for the balance due and was given judgment for a sum of £1,243 and some £22 costs. He was paid part of this sum but £340 remained outstanding. On the basis of that outstanding amount he applied for, and was granted, a garnishee order nisi against the firm of solicitors who were acting for the widow in the administration of O's estate. Subsequently he applied to have the order made absolute. At the time of the application there was a very serious doubt whether the estate was solvent. g The district registrar stated that he was not convinced that the estate was insolvent and he therefore held that the judgment creditor was entitled to the garnishee order absolute. The garnishee appealed.

- h Held – In view of the serious doubt whether the estate was solvent or insolvent the district registrar ought not to have made the garnishee order absolute, thus running the risk of preferring one creditor against others should the estate prove insolvent. The proper course for him to have adopted in the circumstances was to have ordered the money to be paid into court to abide the outcome of an enquiry whether the estate was solvent or insolvent. Accordingly the garnishee order absolute would be set aside; the garnishee would be ordered to pay into court the sum in question and there would be an enquiry by the district registrar for his decision whether the estate was solvent or insolvent (see p 361 c and f and p 362 b, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Edward Moeran & Partners, the garnishee, from an order of the Southampton District Registrar (Mr Registrar Rhodes) dated 23rd July 1971, making a garnishee order absolute in respect of funds in the hands of the garnishee, on the application of George Lee & Sons (Builders) Ltd, the judgment creditor. The garnishee were a firm of solicitors acting in the administration of the estate of Eduard Willem Olink, deceased, for his widow, Margaret Olink, the executrix and judgment debtor, and they had in their hands money belonging to the estate. The facts are set out in the judgment of Russell LJ. d

Peter Langan for the garnishee.

B Coles for the judgment creditor. e

RUSSELL LJ. This is an appeal from an order of the district registrar at Southampton who, on the application of a judgment creditor, made a garnishee order absolute in respect of funds in the hands of the garnishee, a firm of solicitors. The firm of solicitors acts in the administration of the estate of a Mr Olink, deceased, for his widow, the executrix. They have in their hands moneys belonging to the estate, resulting from the sale of a house that formed part of the estate. As I have said, the district registrar made the garnishee order absolute, and the question is whether, in the circumstances of this estate, he was right in doing so. f

Mr Olink died in June 1967 and his widow was granted probate of his will. In December 1968 the judgment creditor issued a writ against the widow as executrix for a balance due of an account in respect of the building of the house belonging to Mr Olink; and in March 1969 there was judgment given under RSC Ord 14 for a sum of £1,243 and some £22 of costs. In December 1970 the judgment creditor was paid two sums of £932 and £82, and at the end of 1970 there was still about £340 owing; and on the basis of that outstanding amount an application was made for a garnishee order nisi. As I have indicated, after considering the evidence the district registrar made the garnishee order absolute. Perhaps I might just add this, that although before the district registrar and before us the garnishee, the firm of solicitors alone, strictly speaking, appear, nevertheless it is right to regard them as also informally representing the executrix of the estate. g

We were taken in some detail through the particulars of the estate so far as they are known, and I do not think for present purposes that I need go into those particulars in great detail. The district registrar in giving the reasons for his judgment said: h

'I am not convinced that this estate is insolvent. It is not at present being administered under Section 34 of the Administration of Estates Act [1925] or otherwise under the Rules of Bankruptcy. This being so, I find that the judgment creditor is entitled to his garnishee order absolute with costs.'

a On the facts the substance of the matter in this case is that here, on the evidence, there is a very serious doubt whether this estate is solvent, and on full enquiry it may well be that it is insolvent. And the evidence at present is not, in my view, such as really enables us now to come to a definite conclusion.

b *Pritchard v Westminster Bank Ltd*¹ in this court, to which our attention was drawn, shows that where an estate which is the judgment debtor's is insolvent, never mind precisely under what rules or how it has been administered, then a garnishee order nisi should not be made absolute, because an equitable remedy such as a garnishee order should not be given if the effect will be to prefer one creditor over another. But as I have said, it is not established whether this estate is insolvent or whether it is solvent.

c So what is the right course to adopt in such a case as the present where, as I have said, there is on the present evidence a very serious doubt whether this estate is solvent? One solution in such a case might be to say that unless it is shown that the estate is insolvent then the garnishee order should be made absolute. But it seems to me that where there is a doubtful case such as the present that would be to run the grave risk of preferring one creditor over others, which would be wrong. Another solution might be to refuse to make the garnishee order absolute unless it is shown at the time of the application for it that the estate is solvent. But this might place an undue obstacle in the way of the judgment creditor when he seeks his garnishee order absolute.

d In this field it seems to me that it is proper to seek an equitable and fair answer: for example, in *Martin v Nadel*² it was not thought proper to make the garnishee order absolute when it might be unfair to the garnishee because there was a risk that the garnishee might in that case have to account a second time for the same sum in the courts of another country. In *Roberts v Death*³ the order was not made absolute because there was a suggestion that the money due from the garnishee to the judgment debtor was due to the latter as trustee for another.

e In my view the proper course in a case such as this is one which is analogous to that adopted in *Roberts v Death*³, where the money due from the garnishee was ordered to be paid into court to abide the outcome of an enquiry into the suggestion that the sum was due to the judgment debtor as trustee for another. Accordingly, in my view in this case the order absolute should be set aside; the garnishee should be ordered to pay into court the sum in question; there should be ordered an enquiry by the district registrar for his decision whether this estate is solvent or insolvent, the enquiry to be conducted with all speed—and when I say 'with all speed' I wish to indicate this also: that of course the full facts about the estate are in the hands of the garnishee and his client and it would be possible for them no doubt, if they wished, to drag their feet about producing the full facts on the enquiry to the prejudice of the judgment creditor. But that possibility can readily be avoided, because if it is appreciated by the district registrar that conduct of that kind was taking place he would be well entitled to say: 'Since I am not getting the information which I should get from the personal representative and the garnishee about the condition of the estate I will conclude that the estate is in fact solvent, and, therefore, I will make the garnishee order absolute.'

g If the district registrar decides that the estate is insolvent, then the garnishee order nisi should be set aside and the funds in court paid out to the garnishee. If the district registrar decides that the estate is solvent, then the garnishee order nisi should be made absolute and the funds in court paid out to the judgment creditor.

j There is, however, one point that I think must be mentioned. It is, I suppose, conceivable that, for example, another creditor may start proceedings for the administration of this estate. If that were to happen before the conclusion of the enquiry by the district registrar, clearly there should not be a duplication of the investigation, and the outcome as to the garnishee order absolute and payment out of court would, in those circumstances, have to abide the ascertainment of the solvency or insolvency in the administration proceedings. a

Divorce – Separation – Two year separation – Parties having lived apart for two years and consented to divorce – Consent – Consent a positive requirement – Absence of objection to decree being granted not amounting to consent – Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2 (1) (d). e

The wife petitioned for divorce under s 2 (1) (d)^a of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 on the ground that the marriage had irretrievably broken down, it being alleged that the parties had lived apart for a continuous period of at least two years and the husband had consented to a decree being granted. The petition was filed three days after the coming into force of the 1969 Act. In accordance with s 2 (6)^b of the 1969 Act and r 12 (6) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules 1968^c, as amended in consequence of the coming into force of the 1969 Act, the wife was required to send to the husband with the notice of proceedings an acknowledgment of service in the form^d prescribed in Appendix II to the 1968 rules containing the question: 'Do you consent to a decree being granted?' By mischance the wife's solicitors sent a form of acknowledgment in the old form which had been in force prior to the commencement of the 1969 Act and which contained no reference to the husband's consent. There was no evidence that the husband was opposed to or consented to a decree except a letter from his solicitors stating that he 'simply wants this affair to be brought to finality as soon as possible'. It was contended by the wife that compliance with the rules concerning the proper form of acknowledgment was not mandatory and that the letter from the husband's solicitors amounted to a consent for the purposes of s 2 (1) (d) of the 1969 Act. f

SIR GEORGE BAKER P. In this petition the wife seeks first a declaration that her marriage to the husband which took place on 5th February 1966 in Bulawayo, Southern Rhodesia, was validly dissolved by a decree in the courts of Rhodesia in 1969. On this issue I would prefer to put my reasons into writing and deliver a considered judgment in due course.

- d As an alternative the petition alleges that the marriage has irretrievably broken down, the parties have lived apart for a continuous period of at least two years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, i e since 24th May 1967, and that the husband consents to a decree being granted. On that counsel for the wife seeks a decree of divorce for the wife.

The evidence in the wife's affidavit is clear except in one vital respect; there is no consent from the husband to a decree being granted. The relevant provision of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 is in s 2 (1):

- f 'The court . . . shall not hold the marriage to have broken down irretrievably unless the petitioner satisfies the court of one or more of the following facts . . . (d) that the parties . . . have lived apart for a continuous period of at least two years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition and the respondent consents to a decree being granted . . .'

- g 'Consents' is a positive requirement. It may be contrasted with what I cannot help knowing was originally in the Bill, i e the words 'does not object to a decree being granted'. Section 2 (6) provides:

- h 'Provision shall be made by rules of court for the purpose of ensuring that where in pursuance of subsection 1 (d) of this section the petitioner alleges that the respondent consents to a decree being granted the respondent has been given such information as will enable him to understand the consequences to him of his consenting to a decree being granted and the steps which he must take to indicate that he consents to the grant of a decree.'

The machinery in the rules for meeting the requirements of that section of the Act was to be found in r 12 (6) and forms 3 and 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules 1968, as amended. Rule 12 (6) requires that on the filing of the petition the registrar shall annex to every copy of the petition for service a notice in form 3 with form 4 attached. Form 4 was the acknowledgment of service and question 5 in that form reads:

- j '[In the case of a petition alleging any such fact as is mentioned in section 2 (1) (d) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 (two years' separation and consent of respondent)]: Do you consent to a decree being granted?'

And in form 3, para 4, appear these words: 'If the reply to Question 5 in the acknowledgment is Yes the consequences to you are that', and then are set out four consequences, the fourth of which reads:

'(d) apart from the consequences listed above there may be others applicable to you depending on your particular circumstances. About these you should obtain legal advice from a solicitor.'

Now this petition was filed on 4th January 1971, i.e. three days after the coming into force of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, and as the husband lived in Bulawayo the solicitors for the wife sent an acknowledgment of service form on that day to the solicitors for the husband in Bulawayo. Unfortunately they sent the old form, i.e. the form which was in force before 1st January 1971, and of course there was nothing in that form about consenting to a petition on the ground of two years' separation. Counsel for the wife who has argued this matter with vigour and ability suggests to me that it will suffice that the petition states that the husband consents to a decree being granted. That document was also sent out to the husband's solicitors. I do not think that that is enough. There has not been compliance with the rules in that the proper forms were not sent. I reserve the question of whether these rules are mandatory or not. There may be circumstances in which it would be right to waive strict compliance and not to require the forms to be sent, for example, when there is no place to which they can be sent because the whereabouts of the respondent are unknown, but the respondent has already signed a declaration or document that he or she consents to the decree. That will have to be decided when it arises. Suffice to say that in the present case I am unable to spell out or imply a consent by the husband. It is said that a letter of 16th March 1971 from his solicitors amounts to a consent. It reads:

'[The husband] is not in the least concerned with the procedural problems that have arisen. [The husband] simply wants this affair to be brought to finality as soon as possible.'

That, says counsel for the wife, is a consent. I agree that it may be an indication that the husband does not object to the wife having the alternative relief prayed for in this petition and being granted a decree of divorce, but, although I have the greatest sympathy for the wife and would help in any way I can, I am unable to find that there or anywhere else is a consent by the husband. Now that is by no means the end of the matter. It is not a fatal hurdle because it is possible for the solicitors for the wife to communicate with the solicitors for the husband, preferably sending the husband form 3 and obtaining his written consent to this decree, before I deliver the reserved judgment. Indeed, if it is not available by then, no doubt it will be available soon after, and if all fails, of course there are other possibilities, other facts, which apparently can be proved, which would entitle the wife to a decree. The only other matter that I need mention at this stage is that I am satisfied that the marriage to which I have referred was a valid marriage and for that I will give my reasons in due course.

Ruling accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SALMON, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJJ

5th, 18th NOVEMBER 1971

b Practice – Service – Writ – Service on company – Service by post – Date of service – Writ endorsed with claim for liquidated demand – Judgment in default of appearance – Copy of writ not received by company 14 days prior to judgment – Application to set aside judgment – Service deemed to have been effected on date when letter would have been received in ordinary course of post – Date of deemed service 14 days prior to date of judgment – Proof to the contrary – Proof that writ never delivered at company's registered office – Interpretation Act 1889, s 26.

The plaintiffs issued a specially endorsed writ claiming £8,152.05 from the defendants, a limited company, as the price of goods sold and delivered, and their solicitors served a copy of the writ on the defendants by post in accordance with s 437 (1)^a of the Companies Act 1948. The writ was posted on 3rd June 1971 and so, by virtue of s 26^b of the Interpretation Act 1889, service was deemed to have been effected, unless the contrary was proved, on the date when the letter would have been delivered in the ordinary course of post, i.e. 4th June. No appearance was entered by the defendants within the time limited for appearance under RSC Ord 13, r 1, i.e. 14 days after service, and so, on 18th June, the plaintiffs obtained final judgment against them for the amount claimed. The defendants sought to have the judgment set aside for irregularity on the ground that the writ had not been served on them. Their application was supported by an affidavit of their managing director in which he swore that no copy of the writ had ever been received by the defendants. The plaintiffs did not challenge the facts deposed to in the affidavit but contended that, the writ having been posted on 3rd June, it was in law deemed to have been served on 4th June.

f Held (Orr LJ dissenting) – Since the evidence of the defendants' managing director was undisputed, the court was bound to assume that the writ had not been delivered at the defendants' registered office at all; it could not therefore be presumed, under s 26 of the 1889 Act, that it had been delivered in the ordinary course of post, for the contrary had been proved. It was immaterial that the letter had not been returned undelivered and that no one was aware until after judgment had been entered that the writ had not been received by the defendants. The plaintiffs therefore had no legal right to sign judgment in default of appearance and the defendants were entitled to have the judgment set aside in its entirety (see p 367 g, p 368 j, p 370 a, and p 372 f, post).

This was an appeal by the defendants, Helmville Ltd, against the order of Mr Commissioner Eastham QC in chambers on 4th October 1971, dismissing the defendants' appeal against the order of Master Elton in chambers dated 30th July 1971 that the judgment dated 18th June 1971 given for the plaintiffs, Thomas Bishop Ltd, in default of the defendants' appearance to a specially endorsed writ issued by the plaintiffs claiming £8,152.05 from the defendants as the price of goods sold and delivered and interest thereon, be set aside as to £1,152.05 part thereof and that the residue of the judgment should stand. The defendants claimed to have the whole judgment set aside for irregularity. The facts are set out in the judgment of Salmon LJ. f

S J Burnton for the defendants.

Henry Brooke for the plaintiffs. g

Cur adv vult

18th November 1971. The following judgments were read. h

SALMON LJ. On 3rd June 1971 the plaintiffs issued a specially endorsed writ claiming £8,152.05 from the defendants as the price of goods sold and delivered. On the same day the plaintiffs posted a prepaid letter containing a copy of the writ properly addressed by first class mail to the defendants at their registered office, 5 Lloyds Avenue, London EC3. In the ordinary course of post this letter would have reached the defendants' registered office on the following day, 4th June. An appearance to a writ must be entered within 14 days after service, inclusive of the day on which it is served. On 18th June, no appearance having been entered by the defendants, the plaintiffs obtained final judgment against them in default of appearance under RSC Ord 13, r 1, for the amount claimed. On 29th June the defendants applied under RSC Ord 2, r 2, to have this judgment set aside for irregularity on the ground i a that the writ had not been served on them. This application was supported by an affidavit of the defendants' managing director in which he swore 'quite categorically' that no copy of the writ had been received by the defendants. The plaintiffs did not challenge the facts deposed to in this affidavit, but argued that nevertheless, the writ having been posted on 3rd June, it was, in law, deemed to have been served on 4th June.

b The master accepted the plaintiffs' argument and accordingly refused to set the judgment aside for irregularity, but, exercising his discretionary powers under RSC Ord 13, r 9, he varied the judgment by allowing it to stand in the reduced sum of £7,000, concluding that the defendants had made out no arguable defence as to that amount but only as to the balance of the claim, namely, £1,152.05. The defendants appealed from the master and that appeal was dismissed by the learned commissioner. The defendants now appeal to this court from that decision. They

c contend that they are entitled to have the whole judgment set aside ex debito justitiae.

The Companies Act 1948, s 437 (1), provides as follows:

'A document may be served on a company by leaving it at or sending it by post to the registered office of the company.'

d It is well settled that a writ is a document within the meaning of this section, as it was under the corresponding sections of earlier Companies Acts which it replaced: see *White v Land and Water Co*¹. Section 437 (1) of the 1948 Act must be read in the light of s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889, which, in so far as it is material, provides as follows:

e 'Where an Act passed after the commencement of this Act authorises or requires any document to be served by post . . . then, unless the contrary intention appears, the service shall be deemed to be effected by properly addressing, prepaying, and posting a letter containing the document, and unless the contrary is proved to have been effected at the time at which the letter would be delivered in the ordinary course of post.'

f Looking at the question raised in this appeal, unassisted by authority, the unchallenged facts deposed to by the defendants' managing director seem to me clearly to prove that the writ in this case was not, and, therefore, cannot be deemed to have been served on 4th June. If the writ never reached the defendants' registered office, obviously it did not arrive there on 4th June. Accordingly, the time for entering an g appearance to the writ cannot have expired by 18th June and judgment entered that day in default of appearance was irregular.

The plaintiffs, however, argue that unless the party posting a document has notice that it has not been received by the addressee at the time it would be delivered in the ordinary course of post, then it is assumed to have been delivered in the ordinary course of post and any judgment or order by default obtained on the faith of that

h assumption is perfectly regular, and will not as a rule be set aside except on payment of costs and showing of merit. The plaintiffs rely for this proposition on *R v Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, ex parte Rossi*². In my judgment, that authority decided nothing of the kind, although there is a passage at the end of Denning LJ's judgment which supports the proposition for which the plaintiffs contend. In my view, however, that passage goes further than was necessary for the purpose

j of deciding the case and I am afraid that, in spite of the great respect I have for any obiter dictum of Lord Denning's, I cannot accept it. The decision in *ex parte Rossi*² is accurately set out in the headnote³ as follows:

1 [1893] WN 174

3 [1956] 1 QB at 683, 684

'... the primary obligation under section 3 (1) [of the Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act 1933] to "give notice in due course" had not been satisfied by adopting the permissive method of sending the notice by [registered] post in a letter which was proved never to have been received by the party interested. The words imported the requirement that the notice given should be received by the party interested within a reasonable time; and interpreted in the light of section 26 of the Interpretation Act, 1889 . . . the service of this notice could not be "deemed to be effected" in the ordinary course of post, because it was proved never to have been effected in time or at all. Accordingly, there had been a defect in procedure and an order of certiorari should be granted to quash the proceedings.'

In that case the notice, being sent by registered post, had been returned undelivered. It followed that at the time of the hearing the appeals committee and the appellant knew that it had not been delivered, but neither Morris LJ nor Parker LJ relied on this fact in any way for their decision; indeed, Morris LJ did not even mention it in his judgment. Parker LJ stated⁴:

'The second part [of s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889] provides that, unless the contrary is proved, service is [deemed to be] effected on the day when in the ordinary course of post the document would be delivered. This second part, therefore . . . comes into play, and only comes into play, in a case where under the legislation to which the section is being applied the document has to be received by a certain time. If in such a case "the contrary is proved", i.e., that the document was not received by that time or at all, then the position appears to be that, though under the first part of the section the document is deemed to have been served, it has been proved that it was not served in time.'

*Hewitt v Leicester City Council*⁵ is another example of a case in which this court has held that when the date of the service of a notice by post is relevant (in that case a notice to treat), proof that it was never delivered at all satisfies the requirement of the second part of s 26 by showing that it was not delivered in the ordinary course of post, and, therefore, not in time.

In *Moody v Godstone Rural District Council*⁶ an enforcement notice had been sent by prepaid registered post to the owner of a caravan site at his correct address, and there was a certificate of delivery purporting to be signed by the addressee. He was prosecuted for failing to comply with the notice and was fined. He appealed to the Divisional Court⁶ by way of case stated. He had sworn (and he had not been cross-examined) that the signature on the certificate of delivery was not his, since he had been out of the country at the time. The Divisional Court⁶, dismissing the appeal, held that the notice had been properly served. I am not prepared to accept all the reasons given for that decision in the judgment. The decision itself, however, was no doubt correct. It seems clear that the notice was delivered in the ordinary course of post at the appellant's correct address. The appellant's case was based merely on the assertion that the notice had not come to his knowledge because he was abroad when it was served. This afforded no defence to the information brought against him for failing to comply with the enforcement notice, but might well have founded a strong plea in mitigation and justified a nominal fine.

The date of the service of a writ may in many cases be immaterial. In the present case, however, the plaintiffs had no legal right to sign judgment in default of appearance on 18th June if the writ had not been served on or before 4th June. Unless the contrary was proved, service of the writ would be deemed to have been effected on 4th June. But the contrary was proved, namely, that the letter containing the writ had not been delivered at the defendants' registered office on that day or at all. Accordingly, the judgment signed in default of appearance is in my view defective.

a The plaintiffs, however, contend that whatever may be the true view in relation to the service by post of notices of the hearing of an appeal, or notices to treat, or enforcement notices, the view which I have expressed should not be accepted in relation to the service by post of writs or county court summonses, firstly because this view is inconsistent with the decision of this court in *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*⁷, and secondly, because it would be extremely inconvenient and, indeed, would amount to a charter to unscrupulous defendants to evade the consequences of service of process on them. I cannot accept these contentions.

b In *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*⁷ the plaintiff issued a county court summons claiming damages from the defendant as a result of a road accident. The summons was served by post in accordance with CCR Ord 8, r 8 (2). The summons arrived at the defendant's address in the ordinary course of post more than 14 clear days before the return day, and thus r 8 (4) was complied with. Owing to the defendant's absence abroad, c unknown to the plaintiff, on a prolonged holiday the summons did not, however, come to his notice until he found it in his letterbox on his return home. In the meantime the trial had taken place and judgment had been given against him in his absence. The county court judge exercising his discretion under CCR Ord 37, r 6 (1) (which gave him power to set aside a judgment obtained in default where it later d appeared that the summons had not come to the knowledge of the defendant in time), set aside the judgment and ordered the costs of the first trial and the application to be costs in the cause. The defendant appealed, contending that he was entitled to have the judgment set aside ex debito iustitiae. The appeal was dismissed. Willmer LJ pointed out⁸:

e '... in the absence of proof to the contrary (and there was no proof to the contrary), the service must be deemed to have been effected at the time when the letter would be delivered in the ordinary course of post.'

This is plainly right. The summons was correctly addressed to the defendant at his home and it went through his letterbox a day or so after it was posted. In such circumstances, I do not think that a defendant is entitled to have a default judgment f against him set aside as of right on the ground that he had no knowledge of the summons either because he forgot to look in his letterbox or was away from home, or his wife or child or servant destroyed or lost it, or for any other reason. The crucial distinction between *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*⁷ on the one hand and *ex parte Rossi*⁹ and the present case on the other is that in *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*⁷ the summons was delivered in time at the defendant's proper address but in *ex parte Rossi*⁹ the notice, and, in the present case, the writ, was not delivered in time or at all. In my view, g unless the contrary is proved, service is deemed to be effected on the day when a letter containing a writ, prepaid, properly addressed and posted, would be delivered at the defendant's correct address in the ordinary course of post. If it is so delivered, the defendant is not entitled to have judgment in default of appearance set aside as of right on the ground that the document did not come to his knowledge. When h time of delivery is relevant, he is entitled to have such a judgment set aside if he can prove that the writ was not delivered at his address in time or at all. This view seems to me to be consistent with the statute, authority and good sense. Section 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889 cannot in my view be given a special construction in relation to the service of a High Court writ or county court summons; it is not a chameleon; it cannot take on a different colour or meaning, according to the statute in connection with which it is being considered. In my view, the plaintiffs could i succeed only by re-writing the section and substituting for the words 'unless the contrary is proved' the words 'unless the contrary is proved to be known to the sender'.

In the present case, the plaintiffs had the option of delivering a writ by hand at the registered office of the defendants or delivering it there by post. Having chosen to adopt the latter course, the writ is presumed to have been delivered in the ordinary course of post unless the contrary is proved. And here the contrary was proved. It is unnecessary to consider whether, in a case in which the date of service is irrelevant, it would be open to a defendant to rebut the presumption under the first part of s 26 that service had been effected. It seems strange should he not be entitled to do so, but the language of the statute may create difficulties which the present case does not, however, make it necessary for me to attempt to resolve.

I do not agree that the construction which I adopt of s 26 need lead to any inconvenience, still less that it amounts to a charter to unscrupulous defendants to evade service. In spite of the occasional vagaries of the modern postal services, the onus on a defendant company which seeks to rebut the presumption that the service of a writ was effected in the ordinary course of post is a heavy one, especially, perhaps, when there is apparently no arguable defence to the bulk of the plaintiffs' claim. Notice to cross-examine Mr Alachouzos, the defendants' managing director, was not given. It could have been. No one can criticise the plaintiffs' advisers for not giving such a notice. They naturally relied on the passage in the leading judgment in *ex parte Rossi*¹⁰, with which I have dealt. If Mr Alachouzos had been cross-examined, he might have so much impressed the master with his candour and the accuracy of his information that the master might have made the same order as he in fact made. On the other hand, he might not. Normally it would be very difficult to discharge the onus of proving that a writ, properly addressed, posted and prepaid, had not been delivered at a defendant's registered office in the ordinary course of post. Writs may well be lost or mislaid in the registered office of a defendant company or for one reason or another fail to come to the attention of the management; and all those possibilities would have to be negated to the master's satisfaction before the judgment could be set aside as of right. In the future, whenever defendant companies seek to rely on affidavits to rebut the strong presumption that a writ has been delivered in the ordinary course of post, it would, as a rule, be wise for the plaintiffs to give notice to cross-examine the deponents of such affidavits. I should be surprised if the onus of 'proving the contrary' under the second part of s 26 would often be discharged. I do not think that, save perhaps in the most exceptional circumstances, there should be any question of an issue being set down to be tried. All that would be necessary would be for the deponent to the defendant company's affidavit to be present for cross-examination at the hearing of the summons to set the judgment aside.

For the reasons I have given, I feel forced to the conclusion, with some reluctance in this case, that the appeal must be allowed.

BUCKLEY LJ. I need not recapitulate the facts which have already been stated by Salmon LJ. To justify their having entered judgment in default of appearance the plaintiffs must establish that the writ was served on the defendants, or must be taken to have been served on the defendants, not later than 4th June 1971. This burden rests on them and, if they fail to discharge it, the defendants are entitled to have the judgment set aside in its entirety ex debito justitiae.

The Companies Act 1948, s 437, permits service of any document on a company by sending it by post to the registered office of the company. The Interpretation Act 1889, s 26, provides that, where an Act of Parliament authorises service of any document by post, then, unless the contrary intention appears, the service shall be deemed to be effected by properly addressing, prepaying and posting a letter containing the document, and, unless the contrary is proved, to have been effected at the time at which the letter would be delivered in the ordinary course of post.

a For the defendants it is submitted that, if it is proved that the writ was never delivered at the defendants' registered office, there has been no actual service of the writ on the defendants and moreover service of the writ is not to be deemed to have been effected at any particular time or, indeed, at all under s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889 because the contrary is proved. For the plaintiffs it is contended that the defendants' only right in the circumstances is to seek to have the judgment set aside under
b RSC Ord 13, r 9, in the exercise of the court's discretion and on such terms as the court thinks just. The question for decision, accordingly, is whether in the circumstances of the case the defendants are entitled as of right to have the entire judgment set aside as irregularly obtained. In many cases in this and other courts it has been stressed that (to borrow the language of Denning LJ, in *R v Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, ex parte Rossi*¹¹):

c '... it is a fundamental principle of our law that no one is to be found guilty or made liable by an order of any tribunal unless he has been given fair notice of the proceedings so as to enable him to appear and defend them.'

There are, of course, necessary exceptions to the general principle that a defendant should always have actual notice of proceedings against him. An obvious example
d is substituted service, where it is unnecessary to establish that notice of the proceedings has in fact reached the defendant. We have to consider whether the present case is such an exception.

Much reliance was placed on behalf of the plaintiffs on certain dicta of Denning LJ in *R v Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, ex parte Rossi*¹². In that case the court was concerned with the service of a notice of hearing pursuant to the e Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act 1933, s 3, which permits notice of such a hearing to be served by registered letter addressed to the other party at his last or usual place of abode. Notice had been served in this manner, but before the date of hearing the letter had been returned to the sender marked 'Undelivered... no response'. The returned letter was actually before the court at the hearing to which it related. The court was consequently apprised of the fact that the respondent had not received f notice of the hearing. The court held that the notice could not be deemed to have been served on the respondent in ordinary course of post under s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889 because it was proved never to have reached him at all. The proceedings were consequently quashed. Denning LJ said¹²:

g 'To sum up, when service of process is allowed by registered post, without more being said on the matter, then if the letter is not returned, it is assumed to have been delivered in the ordinary course of post and any judgment or order by default obtained on the faith of that assumption is perfectly regular. It will not as a rule be set aside except on payment of costs and showing of merits: see *T.O. Supplies (London), Ltd. v. Jerry Creighton, Ltd*¹³. If, however, the letter is returned undelivered and nevertheless, notwithstanding its return, a judgment or order by default should afterwards be obtained, it is irregular and will be
h set aside ex debito justitiae. The order of quarter sessions here was irregular because there was no proper service and it should be set aside.'

It is said that in the present case, because at the date when the plaintiffs entered judgment there was nothing to indicate that the writ had not been received in the
i ordinary course of post by the defendants, judgment was entered regularly and will only be set aside in the discretion of the court and subject to such conditions as the court thinks just. In the observations which I have just read, which were obiter dicta, Denning LJ was speaking of a registered letter which was not returned to the sender.

This would be a strong indication that the letter had at least been delivered at the address to which it was directed. Even in such a case, if it were afterwards established that the letter had not in fact reached its destination in consequence, for example, of its being stolen or accidentally destroyed en route, the question whether judgment in default of appearance had been 'regularly' obtained would, I think, require careful consideration. In the present case the plaintiffs can only show that the judgment which they entered was regularly obtained if they can discharge the burden to which I referred earlier.

The facts are not in dispute. The letter was despatched on 3rd June 1971, but was never received by the defendants. Should the defendants nevertheless be treated as having been served with the writ and, if so, when? This depends on the true effect of s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889. That section has two parts, one concerned with method and the other with time. In the present case the requirements of the first branch are satisfied. The question is whether, in the events which happened, the writ is to be deemed to have been served at the time at which the letter would have been delivered in the ordinary course of post, or whether the contrary is proved. The undisputed evidence of the defendants' managing director is that the letter was not received, and I ask myself how in these circumstances it can be said that this does not constitute proof to the contrary for the purposes of the second provision of the section.

In *ex parte Rossi*¹⁴, Morris LJ said:

'Here, however, the contrary was proved. It was proved not merely that the letter was not delivered in the ordinary course of post but that the letter was not delivered at all. Service cannot in this case be deemed "to have been effected" at some particular time, i.e., in the ordinary course of post: service was proved not to have been effected at all.'

That language, it seems to me, is precisely applicable in the present case. It is true that in *ex parte Rossi*¹⁵ the court was aware of the non-delivery of the letter there in question when the case came before it, whereas in the present case no one was aware that the writ had not been received by the defendants until some time after judgment had been entered, but I cannot myself see that this can make any difference. As matters now stand it has been proved that the letter was not delivered in the ordinary course of post or at all.

In *White v Weston*¹⁶ judgment was obtained against a defendant in a county court in his absence, the defendant never having received any notice of the proceedings. The summons had been sent by post to an address believed to be that of the defendant, but he had left that address some months before. The county court judge at the time of the trial had no reason to doubt the propriety of the service by post under the relevant provisions of the County Court Rules. Nor had the plaintiff any reason at that time to suppose that the letter had been mis-addressed. The defendant was held to be entitled as of right to have the judgment set aside. The decision is, however, of only limited assistance in the present case, for it seems to have gone mainly on the fact that the summons was posted to an address which was no longer the address of the defendant. As Russell LJ said¹⁷:

'A summons addressed to an address with which the defendant has had no connexion for five months or more, however, cannot be said to be properly addressed.'

In *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*¹⁸ a county court summons was served on the defendant

a by post in accordance with the County Court Rules. It arrived at his address, but since he had in the meantime gone abroad for a prolonged holiday, he did not receive it in time. The trial took place while he was still abroad and judgment was obtained against him in default. The county court judge later, in the exercise of his discretion, set aside the judgment but penalised the defendant in costs. The defendant appealed on the ground that he was entitled as of right to have the judgment set aside, but his appeal failed. The plaintiff in that case had fulfilled all the requirements of the code of procedure provided by the County Court Rules. The summons was delivered b in the ordinary course at the defendant's residence. The fact that the defendant did not receive it in time was due to his own failure to ensure that his mail was forwarded to him. It was not proved that the letter containing the summons was not delivered in the ordinary course of post.

c In *Moody v Godstone Rural District Council*¹⁹ an enforcement notice was served under the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 by registered post properly addressed to the addressee in accordance with s 214 (1) (c) of the Act. The addressee denied that he or any agent of his ever received the notice. He was held nevertheless to have been duly served. It was not incumbent on the planning authority to show that the notice had been served on any particular day or by any particular time. Consequently, the Divisional Court¹⁹ proceeded on the basis that the second branch d of s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889 was not called into play. I am not entirely satisfied that it is right to divorce the two parts of s 26 in this way, but in the present case the time of service is certainly important, for it is essential to the regularity of the plaintiffs' judgment.

e By way of contrast to the case last cited, *Hewitt v Leicester City Council*²⁰ relates to the service of a compulsory purchase order. The amount of compensation payable to the owner of the land purchased depended on the date at which the notice was served. The earlier of two notices was sent to the owner by recorded delivery service at an address where she was no longer living and was returned marked 'undelivered'. Lord Denning MR said¹:

f "This is a case like *Rossi's case*² where the time of service was important. The valuation depended on it. Once it appeared that the letter of 20th May 1965 was returned through the post marked "gone away", then it was quite plain that it was not served at all. We are not bound to "deem" a notice to be served at a particular time, when we know that in fact it was not served at all."

g Just so, in my judgment, in the present case, accepting as we are bound to do the evidence of the defendant company's managing director at its face value, we know that the writ was not served at all. We cannot deem service to have been effected on 4th June, for we know that in fact it was not. The contrary is proved. For these reasons, the defendants are, in my judgment, entitled as of right to have the judgment set aside in its entirety. Whether this would be the case if the defendants' managing director had been cross-examined on his affidavit, I cannot tell. In any similar case h the plaintiff would be well advised to test the defendant's evidence of non-receipt with the utmost rigour.

For these reasons, I would allow this appeal.

j ORR LJ. The sole issue in this appeal is whether the defendants were entitled as of right to have the judgment for £8,152, signed in default of appearance on 18th June 1971, set aside. If they were so entitled, it is common ground that the appeal must succeed. If they were not so entitled, and the master had a discretion in the matter, it has not been contended for the defendants that the order setting aside the judgment as to £1,152 but directing that it should stand as to the balance of £7,000, was a wrong exercise of discretion; and, in my judgment, as a matter of discretion, that order was fully justified by the evidence contained in the plaintiffs' secretary's affidavit that, although the writ was not issued until over seven months after the despatch of the last consignment of the goods sold, the defendants had only made complaints as to the quality or fitness of goods of a total price of some £1,150, and had made no complaint as to the residue of the goods of which the total price was some £7,000. a

The defendants, however, claim that they were entitled to have the whole judgment set aside on the ground that they were not served with the writ in proper time (that is, 14 days before the judgment was signed) or at all. The evidence for the plaintiffs as to service is contained in an affidavit filed pursuant to RSC Ord 13, r 7 (1), and sworn by Mr Evans, a partner in the London firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiffs, in which he deposes to the copy of the writ having been posted as first class ordinary mail on 3rd June 1971, duly addressed to the defendants' registered office in London and prepaid. For the defendants their managing director, Mr Alachouzou, deposed that he was able to say 'quite categorically' that no copy of the writ had been received by the defendants, and this statement, although unsupported by any more detailed evidence and untested, must in my judgment be accepted as true for the present purposes. b

The matter at issue turns on the construction of RSC Ord 65 (which deals with service) read in conjunction with s 437 of the Companies Act 1948, and s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889, and also RSC Ord 13 which deals with proceedings in default of appearance. We have been referred in the course of argument to a number of decided cases as to the effect in different contexts of s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889 or corresponding wording contained in particular Acts of Parliament, and it has been stressed in many of the judgments that the effects may differ according to the context. I propose to refer to only three of the cases, which seem to me to have the most direct bearing on the present issue. c

In *R v Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, ex parte Rossi*³, a registered letter from the clerk of the peace, giving notice to the respondent to an appeal in bastardy proceedings of the date fixed for an adjourned hearing of the appeal, was posted to the respondent but returned undelivered before the date fixed for the hearing and was on that date placed before the appeals committee, but they acceded to an argument for the appellant that the respondent was evading service and proceeded to hear the appeal in the absence of the respondent and to make an order against him. Certiorari was refused by the Divisional Court but was granted on appeal to this court. The judgment of Denning LJ contained the following passages⁴: d

I would just add this: if the order had been regularly obtained (as the Divisional Court thought) then I would agree that there would be no ground for certiorari: and Mr. Rossi's only remedy would be by application to quarter sessions to set aside the order made in his absence and to re-hear the appeal . . . Suppose, for instance, that Mr. Rossi had received proper notice of the date of the hearing, but failed to attend because he was ill; and the court, not knowing of it, heard the appeal in his absence and decided against him. Or suppose that the registered letter had not been returned undelivered, so that the court were entitled to assume that it had been delivered in the ordinary course of post. In each of those cases the order of quarter sessions would be regularly obtained: but Mr. Rossi would be able to have it set aside on such terms as the court thought fit and he could be let in to defend on the merits . . . To sum up, when service e

- a of process is allowed by registered post, without more being said on the matter, then if the letter is not returned, it is assumed to have been delivered in the ordinary course of post and any judgment or order by default obtained on the faith of that assumption is perfectly regular. It will not as a rule be set aside except on payment of costs and showing of merits: see *T.O. Supplies (London), Ltd. v. Jerry Creighton, Ltd.*⁵ If, however, the letter is returned undelivered and
b nevertheless, notwithstanding its return, a judgment or order by default should afterwards be obtained, it is irregular and will be set aside ex debito justitiae.'

Neither Morris nor Parker LJ referred at all in their judgments in that case to default proceedings in civil actions, and the above passage in which Denning LJ did so was obiter dictum, but it was accepted as correct by the Court of Appeal in the most recent of the three cases to which I shall refer, *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*⁶, c where the view was also taken, with which I agree, that nothing could turn on whether the service was by registered or by ordinary post.

In the interval between these two decisions *White v Weston*⁷ came before Russell and Sachs LJ. The facts of that case were that a summons giving notice of county court proceedings was sent by post to the defendant on 28th October 1966 at an address which he had left some five months before, and it was eventually returned
d undelivered. In the meantime, on 25th November 1966, in the absence of the defendant who had no knowledge of the proceedings, the county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant having applied to set aside the judgment, the judge set it aside but ordered that the costs of the November hearing should be costs in the cause, and on the defendant appealing to this court against that order
e as of right to have the judgment set aside without the imposition of any order as to costs or otherwise. Russell LJ in his judgment said⁸ with reference to the requirement of s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889 that a document sent by post must be 'properly' addressed but:

f 'A summons addressed to an address with which the defendant had had no connexion for five months or more, cannot be said to be properly addressed.'

And Sachs LJ said⁹:

'I can find no warrant in any of the County Court Rules or in s. 26 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, for holding that service in purported pursuance of C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 3, at an address which at the relevant time was not the abode, g residence, or place of business of a defendant, is good service should the relevant document not in fact reach him.'

In *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*¹⁰ Willmer LJ, with whose judgment the other members of the court agreed, took the view that the ratio of *White v Weston*⁷ is contained in these passages, and with that view I respectfully agree.

h The facts of *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*⁶ were that a county court summons in respect of a road accident claim was sent to the defendant by post in accordance with the County Court Rules and was delivered at his home, but he did not, owing to his being away on holiday, receive it until after the hearing at which judgment was given against him in his absence. On his subsequent application, the judge set aside the judgment but ordered that he should pay the costs of the first hearing. On appeal by j the defendant, the Court of Appeal⁶ (Willmer, Edmund Davies and Phillimore LJ) held that all the processes constituting service under the County Court Rules had been properly carried out and that the defendant was not entitled to have the judgment set aside as of right. Willmer and Edmund Davies LJJ expressly, and I think Phillimore LJ impliedly, accepted as correct the views expressed in the last of the passages I have quoted from *Rossi's case*¹¹, and all three rejected an argument advanced for the defendant that in *White v Weston*¹² Russell and Sachs LJJ had held that there can never be service where the defendant has not received, and, therefore, has no knowledge of, a summons. They took the view that the question before them was one of construction of the provisions of CCR Ord 8 which provided in effect a self-contained code for regulating the service of documents in county court proceedings, and, construing those rules in conjunction with s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889, held that the summons having been duly addressed, prepaid and posted was to be deemed good service on the defendant, although he did not receive it until later, and that in the absence of proof to the contrary it must be taken to have been delivered in the ordinary course of post. With regard to those passages in *Rossi's case*¹¹ and other cases in which stress has been laid on the importance of the defendant knowing of the service before the hearing, Edmund Davies LJ took the view that these statements are to be understood as relating to what has to be done before a judgment is to be finally binding, and in this respect all three members of the court accepted that the discretionary powers of setting aside a judgment, contained in the County Court Rules, provided a fully sufficient safeguard for the defendant.

*Cooper v Scott-Farnell*¹³ differed from the present case in that there the summons had in fact been delivered at the defendant's home, whereas in the present case receipt of the copy writ at the defendants' registered office must be taken to have been negatived. It is also true that in that case Phillimore LJ stressed that the county court is much concerned with debt collecting and with cases in which there is not going to be any defence, and that Willmer and Edmund Davies LJJ were influenced by the specific discretionary power to set aside a judgment contained in CCR Ord 37, r 6, entitled 'Setting aside on failure of postal service'.

I do not consider that the second and third of these matters provide a sufficient ground for distinguishing the present case from *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*¹³ and, as regards the point of difference that in that case the summons had been delivered to the defendant's home, much of the reasoning, with which I agree, in the judgments in *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*¹³ could, it seems to me, equally support a decision in the plaintiffs' favour in the present case.

We are concerned in the present case with a code for the service of process in the High Court comparable to the code with which the court were concerned in *Cooper v Scott-Farnell*¹³, and also with a code for process in default of appearance which is not to be found in the county court procedure but which leads to a result comparable to the obtaining of a county court judgment in default of attendance by the defendant at the trial. In my judgment there is no material difference for the present purposes between the two codes as to service, both of which incorporate s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889. As to the effects of a judgment signed in default of appearance in the High Court or obtained in default of the defendant's attendance in the county court, the statement, which I have earlier quoted, of Denning LJ in *Rossi's case*¹⁴ involves that the point of time to be looked at in deciding whether the judgment was regularly obtained is the time when the judgment was given or signed, and that if at that time there is nothing known to the court (or to the plaintiff whose duty it would be to communicate it to the court) which indicates that the relevant process has not been delivered in the ordinary course of post, it is to be deemed to have been so delivered for the purposes of that judgment, although it will be open to the defendant to apply a to have the judgment set aside in the court's discretion on the ground, inter alia, that he was not served or was not served in time. In my judgment, on a true construction of RSC Ord 65, read with s 437 of the Companies Act 1948, and s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889, and RSC Ord 13, this statement, as applied to the facts of this case, correctly expresses the law.

b RSC Ord 13, so far as relevant, provided by r 1 that in the case of a liquidated claim the plaintiff may enter 'final judgment' after failure of the defendant to enter an appearance within the time limited for that purpose; by r 7, that in order to obtain judgment the plaintiff must file an affidavit 'proving due service of the writ'; and by r 9 that the court may on such terms as it thinks fit set aside any judgment entered in pursuance of the order, in which respect the judgment, although classified as 'final', is not finally binding. In the present case the affidavit as to due posting of the copy writ contained no incorrect statement and concealed nothing which c ought to have been disclosed, and by virtue of the presumption contained in s 26 of the Interpretation Act 1889 the requirements both of r 1 and r 7 were satisfied. In my judgment, both the effect and the scheme of the order is that if the defendant has not received the copy writ, his remedy is to apply to set it aside under r 9. The case is wholly different from *Anlaby v Prætorius*¹⁵ (cited under RSC Ord 13, r 9, in d the Supreme Court Practice 1970¹⁶) where, because of a mistake of law, judgment in default was signed before the expiry of a ten day period prescribed by the rules and it was held that the obtaining of the judgment was a wrongful act not done within any of the rules. In the present case, in my judgment, what was done was within the rules.

e I reach this conclusion without regret because of the obvious danger that, if a defendant is entitled by a denial of postal delivery to have a judgment set aside as of right, delivery will in many cases be falsely denied in order to gain time. I agree that this danger could be met in part by requiring the deponent who denies postal delivery to attend for cross-examination, but this in itself would cause delay and, once investigation has been entered on, I find it difficult to see how it could be limited without the consent of both parties to anything short of the trial of an issue. Where the denial f of postal receipt is in general terms, as in the present case, the plaintiff might well wish to cross-examine other persons or the defendant to call them, and there might also be cases where the plaintiff would be able, and wish, to adduce evidence. All this, and it may be subsequent processes of appeal invoked by the defendant to gain further time, would involve considerable delay and, where the denial is false, injustice to the plaintiff. These considerations would be of no weight if the law as I have g construed it involves injustice to defendants, but I cannot see that any injustice is involved. The most that can be said for the defendants is that they have been deprived by the failure of postal service of the opportunity of resisting, up to the RSC Ord 14 stage but probably no longer, that part of a claim to which they are unable to put forward any defence.

h For these reasons, differing from Salmon and Buckley LJJ in what I have not found an easy case, I for my part would have dismissed this appeal.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Church of Scientology of California v Johnson-Smith

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

BROWNE J

6th NOVEMBER 1970

Libel – Privilege – Absolute privilege – Proceedings in Parliament – Evidence of words spoken in Parliament in support of claim – Words complained of spoken by member of Parliament in television interview – Defence of fair comment in good faith and without malice – Evidence of words spoken by defendant in Parliament adduced in order to prove malice – Evidence inadmissible.

The plaintiffs brought an action for libel against the defendant, a member of Parliament, for defamatory remarks made by the defendant during a television interview. The defendant pleaded fair comment and privilege. In order to defeat those pleas the plaintiffs by their reply alleged malice and in order to establish that the defendant had acted with malice they sought to adduce evidence, including extracts from Hansard, of what the defendant had done and said in Parliament.

Held – What was said or done in Parliament in the course of proceedings there could not be examined outside Parliament for the purpose of supporting a cause of action even though the cause of action itself arose out of something done outside Parliament; consequently the evidence sought to be given must be excluded (see p 381 c and p 382 c, post).

R v Creevey (1813) 1 M & S 273.

Action

This was an action by the plaintiffs, the Church of Scientology of California, whose world headquarters were in East Grinstead, for damages for libel published on a 25th July 1968 by the defendant, Geoffrey Johnson-Smith, the member of Parliament for East Grinstead, in an interview on the BBC television programme, '24 Hours', and an injunction to restrain the defendant from publishing any similar libel concerning the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs alleged that in the interview the defendant implied that the plaintiffs' organisation was harmful. By his defence the defendant denied the plaintiffs' allegations and pleaded justification and fair comment. The defendant claimed, inter alia, that the words complained of were fair comment made in good faith and without malice on the House of Commons Reports (Hansard), which document was absolutely privileged. By para 4 of their reply the plaintiffs alleged malice, and by sub-paras (ix) and (x) thereof they particularised the facts on which they intended to rely as establishing that the defendant had acted with malice as follows:

c '(ix) The defendant asked for an inquiry into scientology on 5th December 1966 (Hansard, 5th December 1966, Written Answer 81, Column 183), which was refused. Thereafter the defendant has consistently attacked the plaintiffs in Parliament. It was in answer to, and as a result of, the defendant's Parliamentary question on 25th July 1968 that [the Minister of Health] announced a ban on all alien scientologists.

d '(x) The defendant's attack in Parliament on the plaintiffs on each occasion preceded rather than followed adverse correspondence which he received concerning the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs will rely on the contents, nature and timing of the letters so received, and on the activities, letters and statements of the defendant in relation thereto.'

e During the trial of the action counsel for the defendant suggested that the court might infringe the privileges of Parliament if those sub-paragraphs of the reply were inquired into, and accordingly the court invited the Attorney-General's assistance in determining the question whether Parliamentary privilege might be infringed. The case is reported on that issue only.

f R Shulman and A R H Newman for the plaintiffs.
Sir Elwyn Jones QC, R G Waterhouse QC and B Braithwaite for the defendant.
The Attorney-General (Sir Peter Rawlinson QC) and Gordon Slynn as amici curiae.

g BROWNE J. In the course of the hearing yesterday counsel for the defendant suggested that there was a danger that in the course of this case we might, all of us, infringe the privileges of Parliament. I should say at once that counsel made it quite clear in taking that point and drawing our attention to it that he was not doing so by way of objection on the part of the defendant to the admission of any evidence or other matters but doing it really as amicus curiae so that all of us would avoid committing any breach of privilege. It is quite plain of course, that the privilege of Parliament is the privilege of Parliament as a whole and not the privilege in any individual member. As a result of that I asked the Attorney-General if he would be good enough to come here, or send somebody here, to help us in this matter and he has been so very good as to come here himself and deal with the matter this morning.

h The principle as to the privilege of Parliament is, of course, entirely clear. It comes for modern purposes from art 9 of the Bill of Rights (1688) which provides:
 i "That the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parlyament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parlyament." I have been referred to a number of authorities but I think it is enough for present purposes if I read a short passage from one of the judgments in the Queen's Bench Division in *Bradlaugh v Gossett*¹ where previous statements of the principle are quoted. That case was decided by a Divisional Court, consisting of Lord Coleridge CJ, Mathew and Stephen JJ. The actual subject of that case was quite different from this case. What had happened was that the Speaker had declined to allow Mr Bradlaugh to take the oath and the House resolved 'that the Serjeant-at-Arms do exclude Mr. Bradlaugh from the House until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House.' The actual proceeding in that case was an action by Mr Bradlaugh for an injunction to restrain the Serjeant-at-Arms from carrying out the resolution of the House. And the decision, as stated in the headnote, was:

'... that, this being a matter relating to the internal management of the procedure of the House of Commons, the Court of Queen's Bench had no power to interfere.'

The principles which I propose to quote were stated by Stephen J. Having stated that the court had no power he said²:

'I think that the House of Commons is not subject to the control of Her Majesty's Courts in its administration of that part of the statute-law which has relation to its own internal proceedings, and that the use of such actual force as may be necessary to carry into effect such a resolution as the one before us is justifiable. Many authorities might be cited for this principle; but I will quote two only . . . Blackstone says³: "The whole of the law and custom of Parliament has its original from this one maxim, 'that whatever matter arises concerning either House of Parliament ought to be examined, discussed, and adjudged in that House to which it relates, and not elsewhere.'" This principle is re-stated nearly in Blackstone's words by each of the judges in the case of *Stockdale v. Hansard*⁴. As the principal result of that case is to assert in the strongest way the right of the Court of Queen's Bench to ascertain in case of need the extent of the privileges of the House, and to deny emphatically that the Court is bound by a resolution of the House declaring any particular matter to fall within their privilege, these declarations are of the highest authority. Lord Denman says⁵: "Whatever is done within the walls of either assembly must pass without question in any other place." Littledale, J., says⁶: "It is said the House of Commons is the sole judge of its own privileges; and so I admit as far as the proceedings in the House and some other things are concerned." Patteson, J., said⁷: "Beyond all dispute, it is necessary that the proceedings of each House of Parliament should be entirely free and unshackled, that whatever is said or done in either House should not be liable to examination elsewhere." And Coleridge, J., said⁸: "That the House should have exclusive jurisdiction to regulate the course of its own proceedings, and animadvert upon any conduct there in violation of its rules or derogation from its dignity, stands upon the clearest grounds of necessity."

It is quite clear, therefore, that no action for defamation could be brought in respect of anything said in the House of Commons itself. The Attorney-General says that the privilege goes further and that what is said or done in the House in the course of any proceedings there cannot be examined outside Parliament for the purpose of supporting a cause of action, even though the cause of action itself arises out of something done outside the House. The question in this particular case arises primarily

- a on para 4 (ix) and (x) of the reply; although it is also suggested that some parts of the defence and one paragraph of the particulars delivered pursuant to RSC Ord 82, r 7, as to mitigation of damages may also be involved. The defendant in his defence here pleaded fair comment and privilege. Privilege, of course, in the ordinary sense in which that word is used in the law of defamation and not Parliamentary privilege. And the purpose of para 4 of the reply is that the plaintiffs are alleging malice in order to defeat those pleas. The particulars under para 4 of the reply, including sub-paras (ix) and (x) are particulars of the facts on which the plaintiffs intend to rely as establishing that the defendant acted with malice, in other words, that he acted with some sort of improper motive.

- b In my view sub-paras (ix) and (x) must involve a suggestion that the defendant was, in one way or another, acting improperly or with an improper motive when he did and said in Parliament the things referred to in those sub-paragraphs. I accept the Attorney-General's argument that the scope of Parliamentary privilege extends beyond excluding any cause of action in respect of what is said or done in the House itself. And I accept his proposition which I have already tried to quote, that is, that what is said or done in the House in the course of proceedings there cannot be examined outside Parliament for the purpose of supporting a cause of action even though the cause of action itself arises out of something done outside the House. In my view this conclusion is supported both by principle and authority.

- c It will be observed, and, indeed, the Attorney-General said, that the basis on which Blackstone puts it⁹ is that anything arising concerning the House ought to be examined, discussed, and adjudged in that House and not elsewhere. The House must have complete control over its own proceedings and its own members. I also accept the other basis for this privilege which the Attorney-General suggested, which is, that a member must have a complete right of free speech in the House without any fear that his motives or intentions or reasoning will be questioned or held against him thereafter. So far as the authorities are concerned it will be seen that the words used are very wide. In the Bill of Rights (1688) itself the word is 'questioned': 'freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parlyament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parlyament.' Blackstone uses the words 'examined discussed or adjudged': they ought not to be examined discussed or adjudged elsewhere than in the House. In Lord Denman CJ's judgment in *Stockdale v Hansard*¹⁰, which I quoted, the words are that 'whatever is done within the walls of either assembly must pass without question in any other place' and in the same case Patteson J said¹¹ 'that whatever is done or said in either House should not be liable to examination elsewhere'. It seems to me that *Ex parte Wason*¹² gives some support to that view although the facts are not altogether clear. That was an attempt to launch a prosecution against three members of the House of Lords for conspiracy to make false statements in the House or outside the House. It is not clear whether the conspiracy was alleged to have been entered into inside the House. But it seems to be more likely that the conspiracy alleged was outside the House although, of course, it was a conspiracy to make false statements in the House. I refer, without reading, to the judgments of Cockburn CJ and Blackburn J in that case, but I notice that Lush J said at the end of his judgment¹³:

- d 'I am clearly of opinion that we ought not to allow it to be doubted for a moment that the motives or intentions of members of either House cannot be inquired into by criminal proceedings with respect to anything they may do or say in the House.'

The most recent case to which I was referred was *Dingle v Associated Newspapers Ltd*¹⁴. The plaintiff's claim in that case was in respect of an article which had appeared in a newspaper which he said was defamatory of him. It was held in that case that the court could not enquire into the validity of a select committee of the House of Commons on which the article complained of had apparently been partly based. The invalidity suggested in that case seems to have been a suggestion that there was some sort of procedural defect in the proceedings of the committee, which of course is quite a different set of facts from the present case. But it seems to me that it really involved the same principle as is involved in this case. As I understand it the plaintiff there was trying to question proceedings in Parliament in order to support in certain respects his case based on a libel published outside Parliament and was held not entitled to do that. By analogy with this case it seems to me that the plaintiffs here are trying to use what happened in Parliament in order to support a part of their case in respect of this libel published outside Parliament in the television broadcast.

I am quite satisfied that in these proceedings it is not open to either party to go directly, or indirectly, into any question of the motives or intentions, of the defendant or Mr Hordern or the then Minister of Health or any other member of Parliament in anything they said or did in the House. So far as the extracts from Hansard are concerned, which were read without objection yesterday, the Attorney-General says that the parties here ought to have petitioned the House for leave before referring to those extracts from Hansard. But he said that where parties agreed, as they have here, the House would be unlikely to take any objection even though there had not been a petition. He limits that in a way I will refer to in a moment. In Dingle's case¹⁴, to which I have already referred, Sir Jocelyn Simon, who was then the Solicitor-General, came and helped the court in the same way the Attorney-General has helped us here, and in the course of that case he did say, and the Attorney-General said that this was still the position¹⁵:

'It was important to remember that the House had never formally waived its privilege to prevent publication of its proceedings. There was, however, little doubt that if a petition had been made for the production of the minutes of evidence, as it had been for the copies of official reports of debates, it would have been granted. It therefore seemed that the court could safely consider a transcript of the evidence [i.e. of the proceedings in committee not in the full House] without any practical risk of collision with the House; but, in his submission, the proper procedure in future cases would be to present a petition.'

Well, if counsel for the plaintiffs or counsel for the defendant want to refer any further to anything which was said in Parliament no doubt they will consider the question of whether they should present a petition to the House. But the Attorney-General limited what he said about the probable attitude of Parliament to the use of Hansard by agreement by saying that Hansard could be read only for a limited purpose. He said it could be read simply as evidence of fact, what was in fact said in the House, on a particular day by a particular person. But, he said, the use of Hansard must stop there and that counsel was not entitled to comment on what had been said in Hansard or to ask the jury to draw any inferences from it. I can foresee that we may get into difficulties later on in this case about this matter. But the general principle is quite clear, I think, and that is that these extracts from Hansard which have already been read must not be used in any way which might involve questioning, in a wide sense, what was said in the House of Commons as recorded in Hansard.

Coming back to the pleadings in this case the result is that in my judgment the matters referred to in para 4 sub-paras (ix) and (x) of the amended reply must

a be excluded from the evidence in this case. So far as the defence is concerned the Attorney-General, I think, makes no objection to para 5 (a), para 5 (b) (i) or (ii) but sub-para (iii) does make a reference to what the Minister of Health thinks. The Attorney-General thought that that was trespassing on dangerous ground and counsel for the defendant said that he was prepared to abandon that part of para 5 (b) (iii), i.e. the reference to what the Minister thinks.

b The other matter to which counsel for the plaintiffs referred as a possible breach of privilege was in a sub-paragraph in the particulars pursuant to RSC Ord 82, r 7, i.e. the particulars of the facts and matters relied on by the defendant in mitigation of damages. That read:

c 'The statement of the Minister of Health referred to in paragraph 5 (b) (iii) of the defence was widely reported in the press shortly after the same was made in response to the Minister's expressed hope that the debate would be widely reported . . .'

d The Attorney-General said that he did not regard that paragraph as involving any danger or encroachment on Parliamentary privilege; I am bound to say that I take the same view. Accordingly, I am not going to impose any limitation under that sub-paragraph.

e A question was raised whether the extracts from Hansard which were read yesterday should not be given in the form of a copy to the jury. I think there are arguments both ways about this. But counsel for the plaintiffs says that at any rate, at this stage, he does not want to put them before the jury, and I think this matter can be reconsidered later, if it arises. Counsel for the defendant was disposed to say that they should go before the jury. I have still got an open mind about it myself, although on the whole I am rather inclined to think that they ought not to go before the jury, although this would be an exception to the general rule, I think, that the jury ought to have a copy of any agreed document. In the special circumstances of this case I should be happier if they did not; however, I am perfectly prepared to reconsider this matter later on in the case if it arises.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, SACHS LJ AND ACKNER J

22nd NOVEMBER 1971

Road traffic – Driving with blood-alcohol proportion above prescribed limit – Evidence – Provision of specimen – Breath test – Requirement to take test – Accident owing to presence of motor vehicle on road – Accident – Unintended occurrence having an adverse physical result – Broken down car being pushed by second car – Bumpers of two cars becoming interlocked – Both vehicles slightly damaged and could not be separated – Whether an ‘accident’ – Road Safety Act 1967, s 2 (2).

The applicant was at the wheel of a car which had broken down and was being pushed by a friend's car, when the front bumper of the latter car slipped under the rear bumper of the applicant's car. The two vehicles became locked and could not be separated. Both cars were also slightly damaged. The police arrived and administered a breath test to the applicant which proved positive. Accordingly he was charged with contravening s 1 (1)^a of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was convicted and applied for leave to appeal on the ground that the police had no right to administer the breath test because there had been no ‘accident’ such as would entitle a constable under s 2 (2)^b of the 1967 Act to require the applicant to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test.

Held – The word ‘accident’ in s 2 (2) should as far as possible be given its ordinary, rather than a technical, meaning, i.e. an unintended occurrence which had an adverse physical result; on the evidence in the present case, as the consequences were too severe to justify the dismissal of the case under the de minimis rule, there had been an ‘accident’, for although the initial operation of one car pushing the other was deliberate, the interlocking of the bumpers was an unintended occurrence which had an adverse physical result; the case therefore came within s 2 (2) and the applicant had been rightly convicted (see p 386 e and h, and p 387 a to c, post).

Application

- b This was an application by Kenneth Morleen Morris for leave to appeal against his conviction on 20th December 1970 at Buckinghamshire Quarter Sessions before the deputy chairman (L J Verney Esq) and a jury of attempting to drive a motor vehicle on a road when he had a blood-alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was fined £50 and disqualified for 12 months. He also applied for leave to appeal against sentence. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

- c M R Bowley for the applicant.
G F B Laughland for the Crown.

- d LORD WIDGERY CJ delivered the judgment of the court. In December 1970 at Buckinghamshire Quarter Sessions the applicant was convicted of attempting to drive a motor vehicle with a blood-alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was sentenced to be fined and disqualified from driving. He now seeks leave to appeal against his conviction and sentence.

- e It was an unusual case, the circumstances of which were these, that shortly before 1.30 am on Monday, 16th February 1971, the applicant was at the steering wheel of a Vanden Plas car of which he was in charge, which was being pushed along Queen's Road, High Wycombe, as its engine would not start. It was being pushed by a Ford Consul which was driven by Mr Travis, a friend of the applicant, who was obviously trying to help the applicant out of the difficulty caused by the reluctance of the engine to start. To that end, Mr Travis drove his own car up to the back of the applicant's, so that they were bumper to bumper, and then proceeded to push the applicant's car for a distance. Nothing untoward happened for the first part of the journey, but when the applicant sought to make a turn into a side road, the bumper of the Consul slipped under the rear bumper of the Vanden Plas, and the two cars became locked together, locked together to such a degree that it ultimately took five or six men to separate them.

- g There was some dispute at the trial as to the extent to which the vehicles had been physically damaged as a result of this. There was some evidence of broken glass in the headlights and broken plastic in the rear off-side indicator of the applicant's car, but for reasons which will appear later the court is not concerned with the degree of any minor damage of that kind which there may have been. The police arrived shortly after the event, when the cars were still locked together, and, suspecting that the applicant had alcohol in his blood, they invited him to take a breath test. With similar suspicion in regard to Mr Travis, they invited him to take a breath test too.
- h The tests were both positive, both men were arrested, they were taken to the police station, and on a laboratory sample being taken, pursuant to s 3 of the 1967 Act each was found to have a blood-alcohol concentration very much above the authorised limit of 80 milligrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres of blood.

- j The whole question in this case turns on whether the arrest of the applicant and the subsequent procedure in the police station were valid, having regard to the terms of s 2 of the Act. As is now well known, before the procedure in s 3 can be undertaken, it is necessary to show that the initial breath test at the roadside was properly taken in accordance with s 2. In this case it was not suggested that the police officer requesting the sample of breath at the roadside was acting on the basis that he had suspected the presence of alcohol whilst the applicant was driving or attempting to drive—the police arrived at a time when it was too late to suggest that the applicant was driving or attempting to drive—and furthermore no one seems to have thought it appropriate to justify the initial breath test on the footing that the applicant had committed a moving traffic offence. The justification, if any, for the initial breath test had therefore to be found in s 2 (2) which provides:

‘If an accident occurs owing to the presence of a motor vehicle on a road or other public place, a constable in uniform may require any person who he has reasonable cause to believe was driving or attempting to drive the vehicle at the time of the accident to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test . . .’

It was on that footing, namely, on the footing that there had been an accident, and that the applicant was driving or attempting to drive at the time of the accident that the justification for the taking of the breath sample was placed.

Counsel for the applicant, who has argued his case with clarity and economy of language, does not seek to criticise the terms of the deputy chairman’s summing-up in detail because he says that there was really a fundamental error in the approach to this case which vitiated the verdict of the jury. His submission is that if an act is deliberately done but has unexpected consequences, those unexpected consequences cannot amount to an accident. Accordingly, he says that since the initial manoeuvre of pushing the applicant’s car by means of the presence of Mr Travis’s car behind it was deliberate and intentional, one cannot say that the unexpected consequence of the interlocking of the bumpers was an accident within the meaning of the section.

The court is of the opinion that the word ‘accident’ in s 2 (2) should as far as possible be given its ordinary rather than a technical meaning. The word ‘accident’, unhappily, is well known in the context of road use and motor cars, and we would deplore any technical meaning being attached to this simple, ordinary word in the context in which it appears. It is evident that the accident referred to in the subsection is something which can happen when a person is driving or attempting to drive a car, and furthermore that it must be an accident which occurs owing to the presence of a motor vehicle on a road. Several attempts at definitions of the word ‘accident’ have been made in the course of argument. We have been referred in particular to the words of Lord Lindley in *Fenton v Thorley & Co Ltd*¹, a case on the Workmen’s Compensation Act 1897, in which the word ‘accident’ was a prominent word. In that case Lord Lindley said²:

‘The word “accident” is not a technical legal term with a clearly defined meaning. Speaking generally, but with reference to legal liabilities, an accident means any unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss.’

Sachs LJ in the course of the argument supplied an alternative, with which the other members of the court agree, in which he suggested that ‘accident’ in the present context means an unintended occurrence which has an adverse physical result. We think that it would be wrong to construe ‘accident’ in this context too narrowly. We are conscious of the fact that this is an interference with the liberty of the subject, but the Act does not make the having of an accident an offence, it merely provides it as a qualification for the taking of a breath test, and the underlying conception of s 2 (2) is that if some unintended occurrence which has adverse physical result arises out of the presence of a motor vehicle on a road, that is a fair basis on which a police officer may request the provision of a breath sample. Such an occurrence is one in which prima facie at any rate the circumstances of the occurrence, and of the driver involved in it, deserve consideration by authority, and accordingly we think that the definition suggested by Sachs LJ is one which fits the intention of Parliament

a and will not open the door unduly widely to the suggestion that random breath tests can be taken in purported consequence of it.

When one approaches the present case on that basis, it is quite true, as counsel for the applicant says, that the initial operation of pushing one car with the other was deliberate, but the interlocking of the bumpers—and not merely a mild interlocking but one which involved very considerable efforts of a number of men to disentangle them—was we think an unintended occurrence which had adverse physical result.
b We think therefore it comes within the meaning of the words in s 2 (2).

One ought to add, for completeness sake, that there will of course always be room for a de minimis argument, if the adverse physical result is so trivial that no ordinary person considering the circumstances would regard the occurrence as an accident at all, but we are quite satisfied that the consequences in this case, whether c there was minor damage to the headlamp glass or not, is too severe to justify its dismissal on the ground of de minimis in any event.

In our judgment, therefore, the learned deputy chairman gave a direction which was a perfectly fair and proper direction in the circumstances of this case. We would add only one other point on this aspect of the case. It is now recognised and has been recognised in a number of instances that there will be cases under this section
d where the primary facts are not in dispute, and when the question of accident or no becomes a pure matter of law, in the same way that cases sometimes arise where the primary facts are not in dispute and in which the question of whether a person is driving or not becomes a pure matter of law. We think in this case that the learned deputy chairman would not have erred if he had directed the jury in that sense. We do not criticise him for not taking that line—he may well have been wise in seeking the e verdict of the jury on the facts before it—but cases of this kind where there really is no factual dispute left, and the matter is one of law only, are cases in which the presiding judge can, if he thinks fit, give a ruling to that effect. If there is a dispute as to fact the issue must, of course, be left to the jury (see *R v Seward*³).

The only other point taken by counsel for the applicant in support of this application is that he says that the verdict of guilty against this applicant is unsatisfactory
f because Mr Travis, who was charged on another occasion before a different deputy chairman, was acquitted. We are told that although the terms of the two summings-up naturally differed at various points, the issue was really the same in each case, and counsel for the applicant says, not without justification, that the applicant will at least think himself somewhat unlucky if, having been convicted of this offence, he finds that Mr Travis was acquitted of a comparable offence. That the applicant
g may think himself unlucky we would not seek to dispute, but there is no support for the proposition that in a case of this kind the acquittal of one defendant necessarily makes the conviction of the other unsafe or unsatisfactory. On the contrary, on the view which we have taken the conviction of the applicant is right, and it may well be that it follows that the acquittal of Mr Travis was wrong. Be that as it may, the acquittal of Mr Travis in our judgment does not justify any disturbance of the verdict h of the jury in this case.

We would accordingly refuse the application. The application for leave to appeal against sentence is abandoned.

Application dismissed.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, CAIRNS LJ AND KILNER BROWN J

3rd DECEMBER 1971

Criminal law – Committal – Preliminary hearing before justices – Publicity – Order lifting restrictions – Application before commencement of taking depositions – Subsequent joinder of further accused – Order applicable to totality of proceedings – Accused subsequently joined subject to order as if they had applied for it – Criminal Justice Act 1967, s 3 (2).

Three accused appeared before the respondent justices and were remanded on charges of contravening s 4 (1)^a of the Criminal Law Act 1967, by assisting in impeding the apprehension of one S after an armed robbery during which shots were fired and a police officer killed. On 8th September 1971, the remand date, they applied for an order under s 3 (2)^b of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 to remove publicity restrictions, and this was granted by the justices. Meanwhile between 24th August and 29th November S and a number of other accused were charged with various offences connected with the robbery. On 29th November all the accused were brought before the justices for the purpose of taking depositions. The justices then ordered that the proceedings should be subject to the publicity restrictions imposed by s 3 (1)^c of the Criminal Justice Act 1967. On 1st December 1971 the applicant newspaper proprietors applied ex parte for an order of certiorari to quash the order of 29th November, and for an order of mandamus directing the justices to make an order under s 3 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967. All the accused opposed the application contending, inter alia, that the 8th September order was ineffective because the Director of Public Prosecutions ('the director') had not authorised the prosecution under s 4 (1) of the Criminal Law Act 1967, as required by s 4 (4)^d.

Held – (i) Where a number of persons were concerned in committal proceedings affecting them all and one of them asked for an order under s 3 (2) lifting restrictions, an order had to be made and it applied to all the accused including those who were joined in the proceedings at a later stage (see p 391 b, p 392 b and c and p 393 g, post); R v Russell, ex parte Beaverbrook Newspapers Ltd [1968] 3 All ER 695 applied.

(ii) An application for and grant of an order for lifting publicity restrictions could be made as soon as the accused were brought before the court and before committal proceedings proper, i.e. the taking of depositions, had begun (see p 391 f and p 393 g, post); R v Bow Street Magistrate, ex parte Reginald Kray [1968] 3 All ER 872 applied.

(iii) Accordingly since the 8th September order applied to the committal proceedings against the three accused who sought the order, being proceedings in respect of a charge under s 4 (1) of the 1967 Act, and those proceedings included, embraced and were merged with the committal proceedings in respect of all the accused, they were all subject to the 8th September order as if they had all applied for it under s 3 (2) (see p 392 d and e and p 393 g, post); furthermore, even if the director had not given his consent to the proceedings under s 4 (1) until after the making of the 8th September order, it did not follow that that order was ineffectual, because the arrest

^a Section 4 (1) provides: 'Where a person has committed an arrestable offence, any other person who, knowing or believing him to be guilty of the offence or of some other arrestable offence, does without lawful authority or reasonable excuse any act with intent to impede his apprehension or prosecution shall be guilty of an offence.'

^b Section 3 (2) is set out at p 390 h, post

^c Section 3 (1) is set out at p 390 f, post

^d Section 4 (4) is set out at p 392 f, post

- a and charging of the accused under s 4 (1) was legal in advance of the director's consent by virtue of the proviso to s 4 (4) (see p 393 b and g, post).

(iv) Since the justices had been wrong in law in making the purported order of 29th November, certiorari would be granted to quash it but an order for mandamus was unnecessary because the 8th September order under s 3 (2) was still a valid order (see p 393 f and g, post).

Motion for certiorari and mandamus

This was an application by way of motion on behalf of Beaverbrook Newspapers

- e Ltd (i) for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the Blackpool justices dated 29th November 1971 whereby it was ordered that s 3 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 should apply to the reporting of committal proceedings against Frederick Joseph Sewell, Charles Henry Haynes, Dennis George Bond, John Patrick Spry, Thomas Farrell Flannigan, Irene Jermain, Barbara Adeline Palmer, Eugene Francis Kerrigan, Panayiotis Nicou Panayiotou and Nitsa Stavrou, on the following
- f grounds: (a) on 8th September 1971, pursuant to s 3 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, the justices ordered on the application of counsel for Irene Jermain, Barbara Adeline Palmer and Eugene Francis Kerrigan, that the provisions of s 3 (1) should not apply to reports of the proceedings against them; (b) the order of 8th September applied to committal proceedings being heard on 29th November 1971 at Blackpool Magistrates' Court against the said persons, and against Frederick Joseph Sewell,
- g Charles Henry Haynes, Dennis George Bond, John Patrick Spry, Thomas Farrell Flannigan, Panayiotis Nicou Panayiotou and Nitsa Stavrou; and (c) the magistrates therefore had no power to make their purported decision of 29th November 1971; alternatively the applicants sought an order of mandamus directed to the Blackpool justices to order that s 3 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 should not apply to reports of committal proceedings being heard in Blackpool Magistrates' Court against the

LORD WIDGERY CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of Beaverbrook Newspapers Ltd for an order of mandamus addressed to the justices for the petty sessional division of Blackpool requiring them to order that s 3 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 should not apply to certain committal proceedings currently being heard before those justices; alternatively he asks for an order of certiorari to bring up to this court and quash a decision of those justices made on 29th November 1971 whereby it was ordered that s 3 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 should apply to the reporting of the said proceedings. a

The facts on which this case depends are brief and not in dispute. On 24th August 1971 three men, Bond, Spry and Flannigan appeared before the Blackpool justices on charges of robbing one Lammond of watches and rings, and they were remanded in custody until 27th August. These charges arose out of an armed robbery of a jeweller in Blackpool, after which, or in the course of which, shots were fired and a police officer was killed. On 24th August, as I have said, three men were before the justices charged with that robbery. On 27th August at the same court another man called Haynes was charged with robbing Lammond, and he also was remanded in custody. Three days later, on 30th August, Bond, Spry and Flannigan were remanded until 8th September, and Haynes was remanded for periods which subsequently extended to 8th September also. On that day, 8th September, which is a significant date, Bond, Spry, Flannigan and Haynes were brought before the justices and charged with additional offences of attempting to murder a police constable, and of possessing firearms with intent to endanger life. On 3rd September, meanwhile, Barbara Palmer was charged with assisting one Sewell with intent to impede his apprehension; one Kerrigan was similarly charged with assisting Sewell, and a woman called Irene Jermain was also charged with assisting Haynes and Sewell to impede Sewell's apprehension and prosecution. These charges arose out of the same incident to which I have referred. On 8th September, which is as I have said a significant day in the history of this matter, these three accused were also brought before the justices and pursuant to applications by them or some of them, who it matters not, the justices made an order under s 3 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 that the restriction imposed by s 3 (1) of the said Act should not apply to reports of the proceedings against Palmer, Kerrigan and Jermain. b

I pause to remind myself of the terms of s 3. Subsection (1) of the section provides: f

‘... it shall not be lawful to publish in Great Britain a written report, or to broadcast in Great Britain a report, of any committal proceedings in England and Wales containing any matter other than that permitted by subsection (4) of this section.’

However there are exceptions created by sub-ss (2) and (3); the important provision in this case is s 3 (2): g

‘A magistrates’ court shall, on an application for the purpose made with reference to any committal proceedings by the defendant or one of the defendants, as the case may be, order that the foregoing subsection shall not apply to reports of those proceedings.’ h

So, on 8th September at the instance of Palmer, Kerrigan and Jermain an order was made by the justices under s 3 (2).

Events were still moving. Other accused were being apprehended, and by 29th November, which was the first day on which the justices were ready to start taking depositions additional persons were before the court. At this time Sewell, Haynes, Bond, Spry and Flannigan were accused of the murder of the police officer who was killed, the attempted murder of other officers and the robbery of Lammond. Jermain, Palmer and Kerrigan were charged in terms not significantly different from those to which I have already referred, and a number of other accused were also charged with playing a minor part in the affair. On the morning of 29th November j a when the taking of depositions was to begin, questions arose whether the press were to be at liberty to report the proceedings or not, and, of course, the answer to that question depended on the extent of the effect of the order made on 8th September under s 3 (2) in respect of the three accused to whom I have referred.

There is some authority to assist in the interpretation of this section, although it is still a relatively new one. The first case is a case in the Divisional Court of *R v Russell, ex parte Beaverbrook Newspapers Ltd*¹. I find it unnecessary to refer to the judgment in detail, and I think it suffices to say that the effect of that decision is that where there are a number of accused concerned in committal proceedings affecting them all, that if one such accused asks for an order under s 3 (2), that order must be made and will apply to all the accused concerned in those proceedings. It is, I think, clear from Russell's case¹ that there can be no instance in which in any one set of committal proceedings, restrictions on reporting apply to some accused and not to others. The stark choice of whether in such an instance reporting shall be permissible in respect of all, or in respect of none, is taken by the Act, and the effect of the Act is that if one accused applies for an order and gets it, as he must on application, all other accused involved in those committal proceedings are also subject to the full glare of publicity which used to apply to all accused before 1967.

d There is, I should say, one further authority which has been referred to, and is of some relevance here; it is *R v Bow Street Magistrate, ex parte Reginald Kray*², again a decision of the Divisional Court. For present purposes the importance of that decision is that it lays down that an application for an order under s 3 (2), and the grant of such an order, may be made before the committal proceedings proper have begun. I use the phrase 'committal proceedings proper' because, by virtue of s 35 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, when an accused person is brought before the magistrates' court charged with an indictable offence, the justices are to be treated as sitting as examining magistrates as soon as the accused appears or is brought before the court. In one sense, and for certain purposes, the committal proceedings may, therefore, be said to begin as soon as the accused is brought before the court, but I am referring in the phrase 'committal proceedings proper' to the moment when the taking of the depositions begins and the decision of this court in Kray's case² shows that an order under s 3 can be sought and granted before the committal proceedings proper have begun. Furthermore, Kray's case² is authority for this proposition, that when an order is made under s 3 (2), the proceedings to which it relates, that is to say the particular committal proceedings to which it relates, must be ascertained in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time when the order was made. In Kray's case² this was a difficult and somewhat complex problem; in the present case g in my judgment it represents no problem at all.

h Counsel who appears for eight of the accused, and who seeks to uphold the justices' order denying the right of publication, has made a number of points. I begin with his second one, which in substance is this. He says that it is not practicable for one accused effectively to elect to ask for publicity for the proceedings until all the accused who are to be concerned in those proceedings are identified and known. He puts forward what are no doubt very sound practical reasons for saying that it is difficult or inconvenient for such a decision to be made by one accused when he is still unaware of the full scope of the intended committal proceedings, and still unaware of precisely who will share the dock with him when those proceedings begin. He says, therefore, that we ought to take the view that any order applied for or made under s 3 (2) before the identity of all the accused is known should either j be regarded as an ineffectual order or one which the justices can withdraw on application if they think fit.

For my part I can find no substance in that argument at all. It may well be that there are inconveniences in an accused making a decision to apply for an order under s 3 at an early stage in the proceedings, but the answer must surely be that he can wait until it is convenient. The section does not provide that the application must be made at any particular time, and an accused who wishes to bide his time, should bide his time, and that seems to me to meet counsel's contention that difficulties will arise if a view other than that is taken. Furthermore, on the authority of *R v Russell*¹³ it is abundantly clear that if one begins with ten accused, and one or some opt for publicity, the others must fall into line, and for my part I cannot see any reason why there should be a difference in this respect merely because some of the accused are only joined in the proceedings at a later stage. I cannot follow the argument that because some of the accused here came into the proceedings later, that this in any way gives them rights which they would not have enjoyed had they been in the proceedings from the beginning. In that latter event *R v Russell*¹³ is authority for the proposition that the election of these three accused to have publicity for their proceedings would have bound the lot.

The question as it has been posed by counsel on behalf of the applicants may really be expressed thus: what are the proceedings to which the order made on 8th September applies? In my judgment there is no doubt at all about what those proceedings are. They are committal proceedings against the three accused who sought the order, Palmer, Kerrigan and Jermain, and they are committal proceedings in respect of a charge under s 4 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 against those three persons. Those proceedings, so defined, now include and embrace and are merged with the committal proceedings in respect of all the accused. The consequence, as in the case of *R v Russell*¹³, is that all the accused in my judgment are now open to the publication of the details of their cases as though they themselves had applied for an order under s 3. However, counsel for eight of the accused says that there is a further special reason in the present case why that general proposition should not apply, and the special reason is this. The charge against the three accused who opted for publicity was a charge under s 4 (1) of the Criminal Law Act 1967. By s 4 (4) it is provided:

'No proceedings shall be instituted for an offence under subsection (1) above except by or with the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions: Provided that this subsection shall not prevent the arrest, or the issue of a warrant for the arrest, of a person for such an offence, or the remand in custody or on bail of a person charged with such an offence.'

The argument, which indeed is an ingenious one, is this. It is said that the Director of Public Prosecutions did not authorise these prosecutions until 15th October. The correctness of that assertion is not proved before us beyond doubt, but there was apparently some remark made in the course of the proceedings yesterday which entitles counsel for eight of the accused to say that he understands that to be so. Given that fact, he says that the order under s 3 sought and made on 8th September is an ineffectual order because it was made in respect of the accused charged under s 4 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 at a time before the director had authorised the institution of proceedings.

I think, myself, that if one examined these circumstances in full detail, it would become abundantly apparent that the Director of Public Prosecutions had taken up this case and had assumed the obligation to prosecute long before 15th October. As soon as the director decides to prosecute, then no further consent on his part to the bringing of the prosecution is required, and from what we have been told I am personally left in little doubt that the director assumed control over this matter long before 8th September.

a However, even if that is wrong, I still find no substance in counsel's argument, because the proposition, which is derived from *R v Bow Street Magistrate, ex parte Reginald Kray*⁴, that the application for an order under s 3 can be made at any time, and even prior to the beginning of committal proceedings proper, means to me that such an order could have been made on 8th September even though at that time the director had not given his consent to the proceedings. The accused would have been in custody by virtue of the warrant of arrest, and the proviso to s 4 (4) makes it perfectly clear that the arrest and charge of such person is legal even in advance of the consent of the director. For one, or other, or both of these reasons, I am satisfied that there is no objection to this application on the special basis derived from s 4 (4) of the Criminal Law Act 1967.

b There remains only the question whether this court in its discretion should grant the relief which is sought. Some complaint has been made that the applicants were slow in bringing these proceedings. I find little substance in that. The order complained of was made on 29th November and the applicants were before this court seeking leave to move at 2.00 pm on 1st December. That is not the kind of delay which should deny an applicant a discretionary remedy. It is said with perhaps rather more force that the first two days of the committal proceedings, indeed the first three days of the committal proceedings, were carried on in circumstances in which it was assumed that there would be no publicity, and that the nature of the proceedings and the conduct of the proceedings was affected by that assumption. It is said now that certain disadvantages will flow because the accused did not know in time that this application was to be made. I think that the blow, if one may so describe it, contained in that allegation is much softened by what counsel has told us on behalf of the director, namely that facilities will be granted for the recall of witnesses if required, but I think in the end the reason for my view that the order of certiorari applied for should go is simply this. The law, as I have endeavoured to explain it, shows that the justices were wrong in the purported order which they made on 29th November purporting to restrict publication of these proceedings. It may be that the simple fact that this court has said so, would be enough to authorise the press to go ahead and report the proceedings. But if that result would follow in any event, it seems to me to be a futile exercise to talk about refusing the order itself on any discretionary ground. Accordingly, I for my part would allow the order of certiorari to go to set aside the justices' purported order of 29th November. I see no reason for mandamus to go because the original order under s 3 (2) with the consequences which I have endeavoured to explain is still in my judgment a valid order.

c CAIRNS LJ. I agree.

d KILNER BROWN J. I also agree.

e Certiorari granted. Mandamus refused.

f The court certified under s 2 (1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960, that a point of law of general public importance was involved, namely, whether a magistrates' court has jurisdiction to make an order under s 3 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 before the committal proceedings proper have begun and, if so, whether in the event of such an order being made at the instance of one accused to committal proceedings, it remains effective if, subsequent to the making of that order, other accused are brought before the court in the course of the same proceedings; and whether the proprietors of a newspaper have a sufficient interest in the making or purported making of an order under s 3 to apply for certiorari; but the court refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
RUSSELL, PHILLIMORE AND BUCKLEY LJJ
29th, 30th NOVEMBER, 9th DECEMBER 1971 d

Estate duty – Exemption and remission – Gift in consideration of marriage – Marriage settlement – Settlement expressed to be made in consideration of marriage of settlor's grandson – Settlor's desire to benefit family and avoid heavy estate duty – Grandson after his marriage settling substantial part of property comprised in first settlement on discretionary trusts for benefit of children and remoter issue other than himself – Whether first settlement 'made in consideration of marriage' – Whether purpose or motive of settlor relevant – Finance (1909-10) Act 1910, s 59 (2). e

The settlor, P, who was 92, had two sons and four grandchildren. He had assets of about £100,000. It was pointed out to P that duty of about £40,000–£50,000 would be payable on his estate on his death and he was advised that the impending marriage of his grandson, R, the first defendant, provided him with an opportunity to avoid such payment and also to provide for other members of his family whom he was anxious to benefit. Acting on legal advice he, therefore, on 25th May 1962, made a gift by way of a settlement of investments worth £80,000 on R. In the recital, the settlement was expressed to be made in consideration of R's intended marriage, and the operative part provided that the trustees should hold the trust fund, and the income thereof, on trust for P until the marriage had taken place and that thereafter they should hold the capital and income on trust for R absolutely. The marriage took place in September 1962, and in March 1963 the whole of the property comprised in the settlement was transferred to R by the trustees. On 16th August 1963 R made a settlement, the trustees of which were the second and third defendants. The settlement was in the form of a discretionary trust for the benefit of the children and remoter issue of P, other than R himself. All the property transferred into that settlement consisted of assets, worth about £55,000, comprised in the first settlement. P died in September 1963. On his death, the Crown claimed that the property formerly comprised in the first settlement was chargeable to estate duty under s 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act 1894 as property taken under a gift inter vivos made by him within five years of his death (as the period then was), and that the property was not, as the defendants contended, exempted from such charge by the provisions of s 59 (2) of the Finance (1909-10) Act 1910, as the settlement of 25th May 1962 was not a settlement 'made in consideration of marriage' within the meaning of s 59 (2). The trial judge held that estate duty was payable on the property given away by the settlor in 1962 because his prime motive in making the settlement was to save estate duty and to benefit his family as a whole, and the marriage was the occasion for the gift and not the consideration for it. On appeal, f

- a Held – (i) No estate duty was payable in respect of the property given away by the settlor in 1962 because the settlement was made in consideration of marriage within the terms of the exemption from s 2 (1) (c) of the 1894 Act enacted by s 59 (2) of the 1910 Act since (a) when it took effect it did so absolutely in favour of R and the settled property became his absolute property with no qualification known to law; (b) the gift was contingent on R's marriage taking place; (c) the gift was to take effect on the celebration of the marriage and (d) it was a gift to one of the parties to the marriage and to nobody else (see p 397 a and b, p 398 c and p 399 c, post).
- b (ii) The purpose or motive of the settlor was irrelevant where a settlement was expressed to be made in consideration of marriage and the sole absolute beneficiary under the settlement was a spouse of the marriage in question (see p 399 b, post); Inland Revenue Comrs v Lord Rennell [1963] 1 All ER 803 explained.
- c (iii) Accordingly the appeal would be allowed.

e Appeal

This was an appeal by the defendants, Robert Anthony Park, Charles Anderson Hinks and Antony Bartliff Little from an order of Foster J dated 12th February 1971 and reported at [1971] 2 All ER 161 that the defendants should deliver to the plaintiffs, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, accounts of the property comprised in a settlement made on 25th May 1962 by Henry James Park ('the settlor') on the first defendant and the subject of a settlement made by the first defendant on 16th August 1963 of which the second and third defendants were the trustees.

- f In March 1962 it had been suggested to the settlor, who was then aged 92 and who had a fortune amounting to some £100,000, that in order to save estate duty (which would amount to about £40,000 to £50,000) it would be advantageous for him to take advantage of the impending marriage of his grandson, the first defendant, to Miss Stockwell and to settle £80,000 on the first defendant in consideration of that marriage. The first defendant could then voluntarily make to all the other members of the settlor's family (the settlor having two sons and four grandchildren) gifts out of the £80,000. The settlor, who was anxious to benefit all his family, agreed to such a scheme after his solicitor, the second defendant, had pointed out to him the element of risk involved in that something might happen to the first defendant either before or after he had shared out the money which as gifts would be subject to the five year rule; alternatively the first defendant might not make the gifts, so the money would be lost to the rest of the family. The settlement made on 25th May 1962 between the settlor of the one part and Henry William Allan Park and John Raymond Park ('the original trustees') of the other part read, so far as material, as follows:

- j 'WHEREAS (1) A marriage has been agreed upon and is intended shortly to be solemnised between the Settlor's Grandson [the first defendant] of Flat G Pampisford Road South Croydon in the County of Surrey . . . and Susan Mary Stockwell of 38 Whitgift Avenue Croydon in the . . . County of Surrey. (2) The Settlor has agreed with the [first defendant] that in consideration of the said marriage duly taking place he will make provision for the [first defendant] and has in pursuance of the said agreement caused to be transferred into the joint names of the Trustees the property specified in the Schedule hereto. (3) The Settlor has been advised by his Solicitors that unless he reserves a power of revocation this Settlement will be irrevocable but well understanding such advice he has decided to reserve no power of revocation whatever. Now in consideration of the said intended marriage THIS SETTLEMENT WITNESSETH and it is hereby agreed and declared as follows:—1. THE Original Trustees or other the trustees or trustee for the time being hereof (hereinafter called “the Trustees”) shall hold the property specified in the Schedule hereto and the property or money for the time being representing the same (hereinafter called “the Trust Fund”) and the income thereof Upon Trust for the Settlor until the said intended marriage. 2. FROM and after the solemnisation of the said intended marriage the Trustees shall hold the capital and income of the Trust Fund upon Trust for the [first defendant] absolutely. . .’

The assets which went into that settlement were of a value of £80,000. The marriage between the first defendant and Miss Stockwell was duly solemnised on 8th September 1962. On 22nd March 1963 the whole of the property comprised in the settlement was transferred to the first defendant by the original trustees. On 16th August 1963 the first defendant made a settlement, the trustees of which were the second and third defendants. It was in the modern form of a discretionary trust, the beneficiaries being—

‘(i) all the children and remoter issue other than [the first defendant] of [the first defendant’s] grandfather [the settlor] of Cotherstone Milbank Road Darlington . . . whether now living or whensoever hereafter born and (ii) the respective wives husbands widows and widowers of such children and remoter issue other than [the first defendant], PROVIDED nevertheless that the Trustees may if in their uncontrolled discretion they think fit at any time during the Trust Period by writing under their hands declare that any widow of [the first defendant] shall be added to the class of Beneficiaries and this settlement shall thenceforth take effect accordingly.’

All the property transferred into that settlement could be identified as being assets comprised in the first settlement and the value of the property so transferred was about £55,000. The settlor died on 22nd September 1963. The Crown claimed that the property formerly comprised in the first settlement was chargeable to estate duty on the death of the settlor under s 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act 1894 as property taken under a gift inter vivos made by him within five years (as the period then was) before his death and that it was not, as the defendants contended, exempted from such duty by virtue of s 59 (2) of the Finance (1909-10) Act 1910. They had accordingly applied to the court for an order for the delivery of accounts and payment of estate duty in respect of the property comprised in the settlement made by the settlor on 25th May 1962 and the subject of the settlement made by the first defendant on 16th August 1963.

9th December. RUSSELL LJ read the following judgment of the court. The facts in this appeal are fully set out in the report of the case before Foster J¹. The question for decision is whether the gift of assets worth some £80,000 by the settlor to his grandson, the first defendant, constituted by the settlement dated 25th May 1962 and the subsequent marriage on 8th September 1962 of the grandson to Miss Stockwell, was ‘a gift made in consideration of marriage’. If so, the contents of the gift are a exempt from estate duty in respect of the death of the settlor on 22nd September 1963. Foster J² held that it was not such a gift so that the exemption did not apply.

There are some matters that are perfectly plain. First, when the gift took effect it did so absolutely in favour of the grandson, and the settled property became his absolute property with no qualifications known to the law; second, it was a gift contingent on the marriage of the grandson and Miss Stockwell taking place; third, b it was a gift to take immediate effect on the celebration of that marriage; fourth, it was a gift to one of the parties to that marriage and to nobody else. We ask ourselves how can such a gift be other than a gift made in consideration of marriage when it has those four qualities? It is perfectly true that the second recital in the document is not correct. That recital reads as follows:

c 'The Settlor has agreed with the [grandson] that in consideration of the said marriage duly taking place he will make provision for the [grandson] and has in pursuance of the said agreement caused to be transferred into the joint names of the Trustees the property specified in the Schedule hereto.'

There was no agreement. But in ascertaining whether the gift be within the language d of the exemption it would have been no different had the recital been 'The settlor having determined that if and when the said marriage duly takes place he will (etc) and has in pursuance of the said determination caused etc'. Similarly if the later phrase in the document had been 'Now therefore' instead of 'Now in consideration of the said intended marriage'.

Reliance is placed by the Crown on what was said in *Inland Revenue Comrs v Lord e Rennell*³ in this court and the House of Lords. It is important to notice that in that case no one within the marriage consideration was given any right to receive any benefit under the settlement; they were only included with other members of the settlor's family in a discretionary class. Apart from the fact that the settlement was contingent and operative on a marriage of two of the discretionary class there was no gift related to a marriage, although the settlement was expressed to be in f consideration of the marriage. The first contention of the Crown was that the settlement could not in law involve a gift made in consideration of marriage (for purposes of exemption) unless it was exclusively for the benefit of persons within the marriage consideration as that phrase is generally understood by the law, subject perhaps to ultimate remainders in default of such persons to take. The House of Lords by a majority did not accept that contention. The next question was whether g on the facts of that case it could properly be said that the gift involved in the settlement was made in consideration of marriage. At this point counsel for the taxpayer was faced with the problem of finding some definition or limitation that would fit the facts of the case without having to contend that every gift to anyone effective and contingent on any marriage was within the exemption. For this reason he made the submission that there was a third requirement, that the gift must be h made for the purpose of or with a view to encouraging or facilitating the particular marriage. Proceeding on that submission the taxpayer contended that the history of the case began with an idea of the settlor to make a settlement of a more ordinary kind on his daughter on her marriage, and that what happened was that on the suggestion of the solicitor the idea was expanded to embrace more money and more members of the family. The majority of the House of Lords expressed themselves as content to accept this third requirement in that case, and considered that the i settlor's original purpose sufficiently remained to make the settlement a gift made in consideration of the marriage, notwithstanding the addition of money and of beneficiaries outside the marriage consideration, and the wish to save estate duty.

3 [1961] 3 All ER 1028, [1962] Ch 329, on appeal [1963] 1 All ER 803, [1964] AC 173

In those circumstances it does not seem to us that the Rennell case³ in any way suggests that in the present case the settlement did not involve a gift made in consideration of marriage. Indeed, our impression is that it would never have occurred to any of their Lordships that anything said by them would suggest for a moment that the facts in our case involved anything other than a relevant gift made in consideration of marriage. Indeed, if anything, the decision is an extension of the ambit of that phrase beyond the facts in this case.

It was argued for the Crown that the Rennell case⁴ totally jettisoned the conception of persons ordinarily regarded by the law as within the marriage consideration as relevant to this exemption; and that consequently the circumstances in all cases must be fully investigated in order to probe the motive or main purpose of the donor or settlor. We do not accept this. We have listed the four significant facts of this settlement or gift. In our judgment, the fourth of these, granted the others, must speak for itself to define the gift as one made in consideration of marriage. The Crown instanced an employer who selected an employee on the verge of marriage, and who, contingent and effective on that marriage, settled a substantial sum on him absolutely, after making it plain to the employee that he was expected after marriage to transfer the money or property to children of the employer. But if in such case there was nothing in law or equity binding the employee to do this, we do not see why this should not be within the terms of the exemption, any more than in the instant case. We must stress that the property after the marriage was absolutely the property of the grandson. Had he died a week after the marriage, estate duty would have been exigible thereon on his death. It is true that later he settled some £55,000 worth of the funds on descendants of the settlor (other than, for obvious reasons, himself and his wife). But he would only have done this, we have no doubt, after legal advice that in law this would be a voluntary gesture on his part, and that it was against his interest and that of his wife and future children (by the marriage on the occasion of which he received the £80,000) that he should do it. We say all this in order to stress the obvious: that the settlor intended this to be, and it was, in law and equity absolutely the grandson's property, provided that, and when, he married Miss Stockwell; and that is true whatever may have been the hopes of the settlor that, by voluntary action of the grandson, other members of the settlor's family would share in a fund free of estate duty. The settlor no doubt considered, when he made this gift, that the risk was small that his grandson would not act in a gentlemanly fashion; but that is no way to impose a trust. It is not in our view irrelevant to observe that, if the settlement in this case had taken the form of a covenant to transfer the property to trustees on trust for the grandson if and when the marriage took place, it cannot be doubted on authority that the trustees could, and would be required to, enforce the covenant at the instance of the grandson because it was a marriage settlement and the beneficiary was within the marriage consideration. In an action in such a case, with the grandson as plaintiff (seeking transfer of the property to himself or to the trustees on trust for him) and the settlor and the trustees (if unwilling to sue) as defendants, the plaintiff grandson would plead that the covenant was a covenant entered into in consideration of his marriage to Miss Stockwell, which marriage took place on etc. The settlor could not deny this allegation, nor (the grandson being within the marriage consideration) resist the claim. Moreover, the allegation would not require to be based on any statement in the settlement that it was made in consideration of marriage; it would be self-evident from the fact that the covenant and trust were for the benefit of the husband of the marriage to take effect if and when the marriage took place. We cannot conceive that in such case it would be open to the settlor to assert that what he had done was not done in consideration of marriage (and that, therefore, the covenant was not specifically enforceable) because his main purpose was, in the hope that the grandson would 'play the game', to achieve a distribution of a substantial part of his

a assets among his family (including the grandson) free from a charge to estate duty should he die in the reasonably near future. We should add that at one stage in argument for the Crown the grandson in this case was referred to as a mere conduit pipe. But a mere conduit pipe need take no action and the analogy or metaphor is wholly false.

b In short, therefore, in our judgment all reference in the Rennell case⁵ to the purpose or motive of the donor or settlor is wholly irrelevant to a case where the sole absolute beneficiary is a spouse of the marriage in question. In applying to such a case any such consideration Foster J⁶ was, we consider, in error. Consequently, in our judgment, the appeal should be allowed, with an appropriate declaration to the effect that the subject-matter of the settlement was exempt from estate duty on the occasion of the settlor's death.

c Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

f Contract – Conditions – Incorporation in contract – Course of dealing – Exception clause – Contract of bailment – Oral contract between garage and car owner – Owner requesting garage to repair car – Manager of garage instructing owner to bring car to garage so that defects could be attended to – Garage's normal practice to supply 'invoice' form to be signed by customer – Form including clause stating garage not responsible for damage caused by fire to customer's cars on premises – Car owner having had car repaired at garage on four occasions in previous five years – Car owner having signed 'invoice' on at least two occasions – Whether exception clause incorporated in oral contract by reason of previous course of dealing.

g Contract – Exception clause – Bailment – Bailee's liability for negligence – Exclusion of liability – Need for clear terms – Contract between car owner and garage for repair of car – Clause stating that garage not responsible for damage caused by fire to customers' cars on premises – Garage as bailees only liable for damage caused by negligence – Clause not sufficiently clear to exclude liability for negligence – Clause merely a statement in nature of a warning that garage would not be liable for fire caused otherwise than by their negligence.

h The plaintiff's car having developed an oil leak, he telephoned the manager of the defendants' garage and told him that he wanted some repair work done to it. The manager told the plaintiff that he was unable to do anything immediately but that if the plaintiff had his car towed to the defendants' garage they would attend to the defects in due course. The plaintiff agreed. Those were the only terms of the agreement. Although the plaintiff had frequently bought spare parts for his car from the defendants during the previous five years, when he wanted a car repaired or serviced as a rule he sent it elsewhere. However, on three or four occasions during those five years he had had the repairs or service carried out by the defendants. It was the defendants' practice when doing repairs or servicing a car, but not when merely supplying spare parts, to have a form, described as an 'invoice', signed by the customer. The form contained a description of the work to be carried out and the price for doing it. Underneath the customer's signature was the following clause: 'The Company is not responsible for damage caused by fire to customer's cars on the premises.' The plaintiff had signed this form on at least two previous occasions when the defendants had carried out repairs to his car. While the car was in the garage a fire broke out as a result of the defendants' negligence which caused substantial damage to the plaintiff's car. In an action by the plaintiff claiming damages for negligence, the defendants contended that, although on this occasion the plaintiff had not signed their 'invoice' form, the clause thereon had been incorporated in the oral contract between the parties by a course of dealing and that its effect was to exclude their liability for negligently causing a fire while the plaintiff's car was in their care.

Held – The defendants were liable to the plaintiff for their negligence because—

(i) three or four transactions in the course of five years were not sufficient to establish a course of dealing; the clause on the 'invoice' form could not therefore have been incorporated in the oral contract made between the parties (see p 402 h, p 404 c, p 408 f and p 409 b, post); McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd [1964] 1 All ER 430 applied, Henry Kendall & Sons (a firm) v William Lillico & Sons Ltd [1968] 2 All ER 444 distinguished;

(ii) alternatively, on the footing that a course of dealing had been established and the clause consequently incorporated in the contract, the words of the clause were not sufficiently plain to exclude liability for negligence; although as bailees the defendants could only be liable in negligence, if they were seeking to exclude liability for negligence they ought clearly to have conveyed that it was liability for negligence which was being excluded; the words used were susceptible to a construction which would regard them as a mere statement in the nature of a warning that if a fire did occur at the garage which damaged the car and it was not caused by the negligence of the garage then the owner of the garage was not responsible (see p 404 f and g, p 406 g and j, p 407 e, p 408 g to j and p 409 d to f, post); dictum of Denning LJ in Olley v Marlborough Court Ltd [1949] 1 All ER at 134 applied; dicta of Scrutton LJ in Rutter v Palmer [1922] All ER Rep at 370 and of Lord Greene MR in Alderslade v Hendon Laundry Ltd [1945] 1 All ER at 245 explained; Turner v Civil Service Supply Association Ltd [1926] 1 KB 50 and Fagan v Green and Edwards Ltd [1925] All ER Rep 266 overruled.

Per Salmon LJ. In order to establish that a term has been implied into a contract by a course of dealing, it is not essential to show that the party charged had actual and not merely constructive knowledge of the term and with such actual knowledge had in fact assented to it (see p 403 g and p 404 d, post); dictum of Lord Devlin in McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd [1964] 1 All ER at 437 disapproved.

Appeal

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Walter William Frederick Hollier, against a decision of his Honour Judge Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans QC at Brentford County Court on 15th June 1971 in an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, Rambler Motors (AMC) Ltd, claiming damages for negligence. The facts are set out in the judgment of Salmon LJ.

R L Johnson for the plaintiff.
S L Tuckey for the defendants.

- d SALMON LJ. The plaintiff bought a secondhand Rambler car early in 1970. I understand that that is a make of car which is manufactured by the American Motor Corp'n. The plaintiff had had Rambler cars for some five years. In the middle of March 1970 he telephoned the defendants, Rambler Motors (AMC) Ltd, spoke to the manager and told him that he wanted some repair work done to the car as it had developed an oil leak. The manager said that the defendants could not do anything about it for the moment, but if the plaintiff would have it towed or sent in on a conveyor the defendants would attend to the defects and put them in order.
- e The plaintiff agreed. Those were the only terms of the agreement, expressed over the telephone. There would, however, obviously be an implied term that the defendants would carry out the repairs and look after his car with reasonable skill and care; and there would also be an implied term that the plaintiff would pay a fair and reasonable price for the repairs. The plaintiff had his motor car conveyed to the defendants' garage towards the end of March. While it was at the garage a fire broke out as a result of which substantial damage was done to the car.
- f

- The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants claiming that the fire and the ensuing damage had been caused by the defendants' negligence. At the trial, the chief issue of fact which was fought—and it was fought very hard—was whether
- g or not the defendants had discharged the onus of proof (which would rest on them as bailees) of having taken reasonable care of the plaintiff's property. The learned county court judge, in the course of a lucid and admirable judgment, said:

- 'I have no hesitation in finding that the defendants failed to show that they had taken reasonable care of the plaintiff's property. I am satisfied that the electric wiring of their premises was faulty in design and was not properly inspected or maintained, and accordingly they are in breach of their duty as
- h bailees of the plaintiff's property.'

- It is to be observed that not only did he decide that the defendants had not discharged the onus of proof resting on them, but that it had been proved affirmatively that they had been negligent. The defendants do not challenge this finding. They rely,
- j however, as they did in the court below, on a clause which they contend excludes their liability for negligently causing a fire while the plaintiff's motor car was in their care. The defendants argue that this clause was incorporated into the oral contract by a course of dealing between them and the plaintiff.

The points of law to be decided by the learned county court judge were: Was the clause on which the defendants were relying to be implied into the contract?

And if so, did it have the effect for which the defendants were contending? The learned county court judge was persuaded by counsel for the defendants (in an argument which I am sure was as persuasive and skilful as that which he has addressed to this court), that such a term was to be implied into the contract; and the learned county court judge found that, on the authority of *Turner v Civil Service Supply Association Ltd*¹, he was bound to hold that that clause had the meaning for which the defendants contended. The plaintiff now appeals from the decision of the learned county court judge on those points.

I will deal first of all with the point whether the clause relied on by the defendants can properly be implied into this oral contract by reason of the course of dealing between the parties. The plaintiff had during the five years preceding March 1970 on many occasions bought spare parts from the defendants. As a rule, when he wanted the car to be repaired or serviced, he sent it elsewhere, but three or four times during those five years he had had the repair or service carried out by the defendants. It was the defendants' practice when they were doing repairs or servicing a motor car—but not when they were merely supplying spare parts—to have a form which is described as an 'invoice' signed by the customer. I need not read the form, which is before us, in detail, but it describes the work which is to be carried out and gives the price for carrying out the work. At the bottom of the form appear the words:

'I hereby authorise the above repairs to be executed and agree to pay cash for same upon delivery of car to me. Customer's signature.'

And the customer normally signed the form. Then immediately underneath the signature appear the words:

'The Company is not responsible for damage caused by fire to customer's cars on the premises. Customer's cars are driven by staff at owner's risk.'

It is not clear whether on each of the three or four occasions when the plaintiff had work carried out he signed the form to which I have referred, but he did, at any rate, sign the form on two of those occasions; one was on 15th April 1967, and the other hurriedly in the rain on 3rd February 1970, not quite two months before the date of the telephone conversation at which the oral contract relating to the present case was made. This form that the plaintiff signed has three copies underneath it, with carbons in between. The three copies underneath the form are retained by the defendants. The top copy is handed to the customer after the work has been done and paid for. The plaintiff did not read the forms on any occasion when he signed them, but there was nothing to have prevented him from doing so.

Counsel for the defendants says that there was a course of dealing which constituted the three or four occasions over five years—that is, on an average, not quite one dealing a year—from which it is to be implied that what he called 'the condition' at the bottom of the contract should be imported into the oral agreement made in the middle of March 1970. I am bound to say that, for my part, I do not know of any other case in which it has been decided or even argued that a term could be implied into an oral contract on the strength of a course of dealing (if it can be so called) which consisted at the most of three or four transactions over a period of five years.

We have been referred to *Henry Kendall & Sons (a firm) v William Lillico & Sons Ltd*². That was a case in which some feeding-stuff was sold by some merchants to a farmer. The feeding-stuff was found to be defective. The farmer sued the merchants. The merchants brought in as third party the persons from whom they had purchased the feeding-stuff; they in their turn brought in their suppliers, and there was a long a list of many parties brought in right down the chain. As between two of these suppliers a point arose whether a term that the buyer under the contract took the responsibility for any latent defects was a term which had been imported into the contract in question by reason of the course of dealing between those parties. It is to be observed that in that case there had been three or four dealings each month between the parties during the previous three years. The course of dealing had been that the feeding-stuff was ordered orally by the buyer and the order was accepted orally by the suppliers. Then on the day of the oral contract, or perhaps the next day, the suppliers sent on to the buyer a sold note. One of the terms appearing on the sold note was that the buyer under the contract took the responsibility for any latent defects. Three or four times each month, year in and year out for three years, sold notes had been sent on to the buyer, and the buyer had never raised any protest or said anything which would have led the sellers to assume that the buyer was doing anything other than accepting the terms of the contract which appeared on the sold note. In that case, although this practice had been going on all that time, and the buyer had received well over 100 sold notes containing the condition to which I have referred, he had not actually read the condition and knew nothing about it. It was argued that, therefore, the condition could not be implied into the contract in question, although it had been made in exactly the same way as all the other contracts, namely, orally, with a sold note in the usual form sent on after the contract had been made. The House of Lords decided that the fact that the buyer had not read the condition on the sold notes, having had every opportunity of doing so, did not avail him, because any reasonable seller in circumstances such as those, having had no intimation from the buyer that he took any objection to the condition, would have had good cause to assume that the buyer was agreeing to the condition.

That case is obviously very different from the present case. That seems to be a typical case where a consistent course of dealing between the parties makes it imperative for the court to read into the contract the condition for which the sellers were contending. Everything that the buyer had done, or failed to do, would have convinced any ordinary seller that the buyer was agreeing to the terms in question. The fact that the buyer had not read the term is beside the point. The seller could not be expected to know that the buyer had not troubled to acquaint himself with what was written in the form that had been sent to him so often, year in and year out during the previous three years, in transactions exactly the same as the transaction then in question.

The buyer in that case sought to rely on *McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd*³, which was also a decision of the House of Lords. He relied on that authority chiefly for a passage in the speech of Lord Devlin⁴, which taken literally would mean that no term can be implied into a contract by a course of dealing unless it can be shown that the party charged has actual and not only constructive knowledge of the term, and with such actual knowledge has in fact assented to it. *McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd*³ is an example of a case in which dealings between the parties prior to the contract in question cannot be relied on to import a term into the relevant contract. In that case the appellant had asked his brother-in-law to have a car shipped from the Isle of Islay to the mainland. The appellant had personally consigned goods on four previous occasions. On three of them he was acting on behalf of his employer; on the other occasion he sent his own car; and each time he signed what was called a 'risk note'. The risk note made it plain that the respondents were accepting the goods on their ship on the condition that they would not be responsible for any damage by negligence that the goods might suffer during the course of the voyage. In that case, through negligence, the ship sank and the car was lost. The appellant's brother-in-law, who took the car to be shipped on the occasion in question, had himself consigned goods of various kinds on a number of previous occasions. He said that sometimes he had signed a note, and sometimes he had not. On one occasion he sent his own car. He said that on the occasion in question no risk note was put before him. Apparently, unknown to him, the purser, by mistake, had taken the car on board without asking him to sign the risk note. The House of Lords held, as I have already indicated, that there was no previous course of dealing from which the term of exclusion could be implied into the contract which had been made on behalf of the appellant by his brother-in-law.

It seems to me that if it was impossible to rely on a course of dealing in *McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd*⁵, still less would it be possible to do so in this case, when the so-called course of dealing consisted only of three or four transactions in the course of five years. As I read the speeches of Lord Reid, Lord Guest and Lord Pearce, one, but only one amongst many, of the facts to be taken into account in considering whether there had been a course of dealing from which a term was to be implied into the contract was whether the consignor actually knew what were the terms written on the back of the risk note. Lord Devlin said that this was a critical factor. Even on the assumption that Lord Devlin's dictum went further than was necessary for the decision in that case, and was wrong—which I think is the effect of *Henry Kendall & Sons (a firm) v William Lillico & Sons Ltd*⁶—I do not see how that can help the defendants here. The speeches of the other members of the House and the decision itself in McCutcheon's case⁵ make it plain that the clause on which the defendants seek to rely cannot in law be imported into the oral contract they made in March 1970.

That really disposes of this appeal, but in case I am wrong on the view that I have formed, without any hesitation I may say, that the course of dealing did not import the so-called exclusion clause, I think I should deal with the point as to whether or not the words on the bottom of the form, had they been incorporated in the contract, would have excluded the defendants' liability to compensate the plaintiff for damage to the plaintiff's car by a fire which had been caused by the defendants' own negligence. It is well settled that a clause excluding liability for negligence should make its meaning plain on its face to any ordinarily literate and sensible person. The easiest way of doing that, of course, is to state expressly that the garage, tradesman or merchant, as the case may be, will not be responsible for any damage caused by his own negligence. No doubt merchants, tradesmen, garage proprietors and the like are a little shy of writing in an exclusion clause quite so bluntly as that. Clearly it would not tend to attract customers, and might even put many off. I am not saying that an exclusion clause cannot be effective to exclude negligence unless it does so expressly, but in order for the clause to be effective the language should be so plain that it clearly bears that meaning. I do not think that defendants should be allowed to shelter behind language which might lull the customer into a false sense of security by letting him think—unless perhaps he happens to be a lawyer—that he would have redress against the person with whom he was dealing for any damage which he, the customer, might suffer by the negligence of that person.

'For the present purposes a rougher test will serve. In construing an exemption clause certain general rules may be applied: First the defendant is not exempted from liability for the negligence of his servants unless adequate words are used; secondly, the liability of the defendant apart from the exempting words must be ascertained; then the particular clause in question must be considered; and if the only liability of the party pleading the exemption is a liability for negligence, the clause will more readily operate to exempt him'.

a Scrutton LJ was far too great a lawyer, and had far too much robust common sense, if I may be permitted to say so, to put it higher than that 'if the only liability of the party pleading the exemption is a liability for negligence, the clause will more readily operate to exempt him'. He does not say that 'if the only liability of the party pleading the exemption is a liability for negligence, the clause will necessarily exempt him'. After all, there are many cases in the books dealing with exemption clauses, and in every case it comes down to a question of construing the alleged exemption clause which is then before the court. It seems to me that in *Rutter v Palmer*⁸, although the word 'negligence' was never used in the exemption clause, the exemption clause would have conveyed to any ordinary, literate and sensible person that the garage in that case was inserting a clause in the contract which excluded their liability for the negligence of their drivers. The clause being considered in that case—and it was without doubt incorporated in the contract—was: 'Customers' cars are driven by your staff at customers' sole risk . . .' Any ordinary man knows that when a car is damaged it is not infrequently damaged because the driver has driven it negligently. He also knows, I suppose, that if he sends it to a garage and a driver in the employ of the garage takes the car on the road for some purpose in connection with the work which the customer has entrusted the garage to do, the garage could not conceivably be liable for the car being damaged in an accident unless the driver was at fault. It follows that no sensible man could have thought that the words in that case had any meaning except that the garage would not be liable for the negligence of their own drivers. That is a typical case where, on the construction of the clause in question, the meaning for which the defendant was there contending was the obvious meaning of the clause.

e The next case to which I wish to refer is the well-known case of *Alderslade v Hendon Laundry Ltd*⁹. In that case articles were sent by the plaintiff to the defendants' laundry to be washed, and they were lost. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants for damages, the defendants relied on the following condition to limit their liability: 'The maximum amount allowed for lost or damaged articles is 20 times the charge made for laundering.' Again, this was a case where negligence was not expressly excluded. The question was: what do the words mean? f I have no doubt that they would mean to the ordinary housewife who was sending her washing to the laundry that, if the goods were lost or damaged in the course of being washed through the negligence of the laundry, the laundry would not be liable for more than 20 times the charge made for the laundering. I say that for this reason. It is, I think, obvious that when a laundry loses or damages goods it is almost invariably because there has been some neglect or default on the part of the laundry. It is said that thieves break in and steal, and the goods (in that case handkerchiefs) might have been stolen by thieves. That of course is possible, but I should hardly think that a laundry would be a great allurements to burglars. It is a little far-fetched to think of burglars breaking into a laundry to steal the washing when there are banks, jewellers, post offices, factories, offices and homes likely to contain money and articles far more attractive to burglars. I think that the ordinary sensible housewife, or indeed anyone else who sends washing to the laundry, reading that clause must have appreciated that almost always when goods are lost or damaged it is because of the laundry's negligence, and, therefore, this clause could apply only to limit the liability of the laundry, when they were in fault or negligent.

h But counsel for the defendants has drawn our attention to the words used by Lord Greene MR in delivering the leading judgment in this court, and he contends that j Lord Greene MR was in fact making a considerable extension to the law as laid down by Scrutton LJ in *Rutter v Palmer*⁸. For this proposition he relies on the following passage in Lord Greene MR's judgment¹⁰:

8 [1922] 2 KB 87, [1922] All ER Rep 367

10 [1945] 1 All ER at 245, [1945] KB at 192

'The effect of those authorities can I think be stated as follows: where the head of damage in respect of which limitation of liability is sought to be imposed by such a clause is one which rests on negligence and nothing else, the clause must be construed as extending to that head of damage, because if it were not so construed it would lack subject-matter.'

If one takes that work 'must' au pied de la lettre that passage does support counsel for the defendants' contention. However, we are not here construing a statute, but a passage in an unreserved judgment of the Master of the Rolls, who was clearly intending no more than to restate the effect of the authorities as they then stood. It is to be observed that MacKinnon LJ, who gave the other judgment in this court, relied on the rule or principle which he said was very admirably stated by Scrutton LJ in *Rutter v Palmer*¹¹. He said¹²:

'Applying that principle to the facts of this case, I think that this clause does avail to protect the proprietor of the laundry in respect of liability for negligence, which must be assumed to be the cause of these handkerchiefs having disappeared.'

And clearly it did, for the reasons that I have already given. I do not think that Lord Greene MR was intending to extend the law in the sense for which counsel for the defendants contends. If it were so extended, it would make the law entirely artificial by ignoring that rules of construction are merely our guides and not our masters; in the end you are driven back to construing the clause in question to see what it means. Applying the principles laid down by Scrutton LJ, they lead to the result at which the court arrived at in *Alderslade v Hendon Laundry Ltd*¹³. In my judgment these principles lead to a very different result in the present case. The words are: 'The Company is not responsible for damage caused by fire to customer's cars on the premises.' What would that mean to any ordinary literate and sensible car owner? I do not suppose that any such, unless he is a trained lawyer, has an intimate or, indeed, any knowledge of the liability of bailees in law. If you asked the ordinary man or woman: 'Supposing you send your car to the garage to be repaired, and there is a fire, would you suppose that the garage would be liable?', I should be surprised if many of them did not answer, quite wrongly, 'Of course they are liable if there is a fire'. Others might be more cautious and say, 'Well, I had better ask my solicitor', or, 'I do not know. I suppose they may well be liable'. That is the crucial difference, to my mind, between this case and *Alderslade v Hendon Laundry Ltd*¹³ and *Rutter v Palmer*¹¹. In those two cases, any ordinary man or woman reading the conditions would have known that all that was being excluded was the negligence of the laundry, in the one case, and the garage, in the other. But here I think the ordinary man or woman would be equally surprised and horrified to learn that if the garage was so negligent that a fire was caused which damaged their car, they would be without remedy because of the words in the condition. I can quite understand that the ordinary man or woman would consider that, because of these words, the mere fact that there was a fire would not make the garage liable. Fires can occur from a large variety of causes, only one of which is negligence on the part of the occupier of the premises, and that is by no means the most frequent cause. The ordinary man would I think say to himself: 'Well, what they are telling me is that if there is a fire due to any cause other than their own negligence they are not responsible for it'. To my mind, if the defendants were seeking to exclude their responsibility for a fire caused by their own negligence, they ought to have done so in far plainer language than the language here used. In my view, the words of the condition would be understood as being meant to be a warning to the customer that if a fire does occur at the garage which damages the car, and it is not caused by the negligence of the garage owner, then the garage owner is not responsible for damage.

a There is another case which I think throws some light on the problem before us, and that is *Olley v Marlborough Court Ltd*¹⁴. In that case there was a notice in the bedroom of a private residential hotel to this effect: 'The proprietors will not hold themselves responsible for articles lost or stolen unless handed to the manageress for safe custody.' Owing to the negligence of the hotel, a thief managed to get into a room, which had been taken by the plaintiff, and stole a quantity of articles. The plaintiff brought an action against the proprietors of the hotel, and succeeded in this court. In that case there was a question whether the notice to which I have referred formed part of the contract between the plaintiff and the hotel proprietors; and there was also some question whether the hotel was an inn, in which case they would have been to some extent insurers of the goods, and another question whether the hotel was only a private hotel. This court considered the case on the basis that the notice did form part of the contract between the parties, and that the hotel was a private hotel, and came to the conclusion, as I have already indicated, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Denning LJ said¹⁵:

d 'Ample content can be given to the notice by construing it as a warning that the hotel proprietor is not liable, in the absence of negligence. As such it serves a useful purpose. It is a warning to the guest that he must do his part to take care of his things himself, and, if need be, insure them. It is unnecessary to go further and to construe the notice as a contractual exemption of the defendants from their common law liability for negligence.'

Similarly, I think, in this case the words at the bottom of this form can be given ample content by construing them as a warning in the sense that I have already indicated. It seems plain that if the notice in the bedroom of the hotel had read as follows: 'Proprietors will not hold themselves responsible for articles lost or stolen, nor for the damage or destruction of articles caused by fire', and then there had been a full stop, and the notice went on to say that to avoid articles being lost or stolen they should be handed to the manageress for safe custody, for the reasons which this court gave it would have come to the conclusion that the notice would not have excluded the hotel proprietors from liability for the loss of articles by a fire caused by their own negligence.

f We have been referred to the case on which the learned county court judge relied and by which he was bound, namely, the decision of Sankey J in *Turner v Civil Service Supply Association Ltd*¹⁶. In that case the defendants were furniture removers and warehousemen, and they entered into a contract to remove the plaintiff's furniture from London to Hailsham. The contract was made subject to various conditions. The plaintiff's goods were loaded on to the defendants' motor lorry, and in the course of transfer a fire caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants destroyed the bulk of the goods and damaged the remainder. Sankey J held, as he said with some hesitation and reluctance, that cl 11 in the contract did exempt the defendants from liability. That clause read:

h 'The contractors are not responsible for loss or damage caused by fire, aircraft or bombardment to property in transit, in storage, or in process of being packed . . .'

j Sankey J thought that, since the defendants could not be responsible for damage by fire, save fire caused by negligence, the clause to which I have referred must necessarily be taken to exclude their liability for negligence. I am afraid I cannot agree with that decision. It is fair to say, reading that judgment, that the correct arguments do not appear to have been addressed to the court. I think that in that case the defendants were in an even weaker position than the defendants are here. Clause 11 was manifestly dealing with matters which had nothing to do with negligence: 'The contractors are not responsible for loss or damage caused by fire, aircraft or bombardment to property in transit . . .' It is difficult to see how the contractors could have been liable for any damage by aircraft or bombardment. It is hardly to be supposed that they would have negligently manipulated an aircraft over one of their own lorries, or bombarded it. It seems to me manifest that that clause was merely a warning to the customer that the contractors were not responsible for damage by fire, aircraft or bombardment, so that he could insure the goods against those risks. That case does not decide anything except what the learned judge conceived to be the true construction of the clause there in question. In my judgment, his decision was wrong. I consider also, for much the same reasons, that the decision in *Fagan v Green and Edwards Ltd*¹⁷, following *Turner v Civil Service Supply Association Ltd*¹⁸, was wrong.

There have been many cases, to which I do not think it is necessary to refer, in which these exclusion clauses have been construed in relation to the liability of common carriers. I do not think those cases have any application to the present case. Some of them may appear not to be very satisfactory, but they can be reconsidered should the occasion arise. It does not arise in this case.

For these reasons, I have come to the conclusion that, although this was a most careful and in many ways an excellent judgment, the decision was wrong: first, on the point whether or not the term relied on by the defendants was imported into the contract by a course of dealing; and secondly, on the construction of the clause, although on this point the learned county court judge was bound by the decision of Sankey J¹⁸ to reach the conclusion at which he arrived. For these reasons, I would allow the appeal. Before parting with this case, I should like to say how much we are indebted to learned counsel on both sides for their most interesting and able arguments.

STAMP LJ. I agree, for the reasons given by Salmon LJ, that the course of dealings between parties described by Salmon LJ was not such that the terms of earlier contracts can properly be imported into the oral contract here in question.

On the question of construction, I reach the same conclusion as Salmon LJ, but by, I think, a slightly different route. As I understand the law, it is settled that where in a contract such as this you find a provision excluding liability capable of two constructions, one of which will make it applicable where there is no negligence by the defendant, and the other will make it applicable where there is negligence by the defendant, it requires special words or special circumstances to make the clause exclude liability in case of negligence: see, for example, *Price & Co v Union Lighterage Co*¹⁹. Similarly, I would hold that where the words relied on by the defendant are susceptible either to a construction under which they become a statement of fact in the nature of a warning or to a construction which will exempt the defendant from liability for negligence, the former construction is to be preferred. The words here, 'The Company is not responsible for damage caused by fire to customer's cars on the premises', are, in my judgment, certainly susceptible to a construction which would regard them as a mere statement in the nature of a warning, and reinforced by the principle that I have stated, I would hold that that is how they ought to be construed in this case. If this be correct, I do not find it necessary to consider the cases which have been decided on the footing that the clause under consideration was a term of the contract excluding some liability; for on the view that I have formed, the clause on its true construction is not a clause of that nature.

a For those reasons, I would agree with the conclusion of Salmon LJ. I also agree, for the reasons which he has given, that the decisions in *Turner v Civil Service Supply Association Ltd*²⁰ and *Fagan v Green & Edwards Ltd*¹ cannot be regarded as reliable authorities. I, too, would allow the appeal.

b LATEY J. As regards the first ground of appeal, namely, that the learned county court judge was wrong in holding that these printed words were imported as a term into the oral agreement by a course of dealing, I agree that the learned judge, while his findings of primary fact on the evidence were impeccable, did reach a mistaken conclusion. As I so wholly agree with the reasons stated by Salmon and Stamp LJJ, there is no need to repeat them.

c As regards the second ground of appeal, the main stream of the law, the basic principle, as I understand it, is that if A enters into a contract with B and wants to include in it a term exempting himself from liability for his own negligence, to be effective that term must sufficiently clearly convey that it is liability for negligence which is being excluded. It has been argued during this appeal that where A cannot be liable otherwise than in negligence, no such sufficiently clear words are required. d In my opinion, that is not the law. In each case one has to look at the words which are claimed to exempt. When in fact A can be liable in negligence only, the law, I believe, is that that fact, to employ Scrutton LJ's words in *Rutter v Palmer*², 'will more readily operate to exempt him'. But the law goes no further than that.

In saying that, I want to add that I wholly and emphatically agree with what Salmon LJ has said in his judgment when dealing with *Rutter v Palmer*³ and *Alderslade v Hendon Laundry Ltd*⁴; when referring to the passage in Lord Greene MR's judgment e in the latter case; and with what he has said about *Turner v Civil Service Supply Association Ltd*²⁰ and *Fagan v Green & Edwards Ltd*¹. In the sense I have mentioned and to that limited extent, in this case the defendants are entitled to pray in aid that as bailees they could only be liable in negligence and, therefore, that the court should more readily read these words as sufficient words of exemption. I approach the words f in question with that in mind and, doing so, to my mind these words would not convey to many intelligent laymen that the garage is saying: 'If your car is damaged by fire we shall not be liable, and this is so even though it is due to our own fault that the fire happens.' In my opinion, other and plainer words are required. I, therefore, agree that on both grounds this appeal should be allowed.

Parker v Parker

CUMMING-BRUCE J

9th, 10th, 11th NOVEMBER 1971

Divorce – Separation – Five year separation – Decree nisi – Refusal – Grave financial or other hardship – Financial hardship – Offsetting contingent financial loss – Husband serving police officer – Husband seeking decree – Wife thereby losing pension rights under police pension scheme – Loss constituting grave financial hardship to wife – Possibility of offsetting loss by means of insurance policy – Husband capable of paying premiums out of own resources – Husband securing obligation by means of second mortgage on his house – Decree granted – Divorce Reform Act 1969, ss 2 (1) (e), 4.

Divorce – Separation – Five year separation – Decree nisi – Refusal – Grave financial or other hardship – Pleading – Facts relied on in support of plea of grave financial hardship – Facts of confession and avoidance – Facts relied on to be pleaded – Procedure for obtaining further information.

The parties were married in 1949 and had two children born in 1951 and 1958. Since 1951 the husband had been a police officer. In 1962 the husband became friendly with another woman with whom he started to cohabit. In September 1964, after the husband, despite his promises, had failed to return to the wife, she obtained a matrimonial order with a non-cohabitation clause and maintenance for herself and the two children. The wife started work again and was employed as an auxiliary nurse, her take-home pay being £13. The rent for her council house was £4.50. She was entitled to a pension of £2.60 at the age of 60, i.e. in 13 years' time, if she continued in her employment, together with a lump sum tax-free payment of £446. The husband petitioned for divorce under s 2 (1) (e) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 on the ground that the parties had lived apart for a continuous period of at least five years. The wife opposed the petition under s 4 of the 1969 Act on the ground that the dissolution of the marriage would result in grave financial or other hardship to her and that it would be wrong in all the circumstances to dissolve the marriage. In her answer the wife alleged that she had been a loyal wife and that the husband had incurred further financial responsibility by setting up another home. She alleged that in the event of dissolution she would lose pension rights under the police pension scheme and would have to pay higher contributions and receive a lower rate of pension in respect of her state retirement pension. The loss of entitlement to the police widow's pension was much the most important element of her contingent loss. According to the evidence: (i) if the husband died at his present salary her pension would be £186; (ii) if he left the police force within five years, no widow's pension right would survive; (iii) in five years time she would have a vested right to £319 whether the husband was still in the force or not; (iv) the maximum pension if he served 30 years, would be £425. These figures were liable to increase as a result of increases in the husband's salary and the two-yearly review under the Pensions (Increase) Act 1971 designed to take account of inflation. Apart from leaving his wife the husband had behaved honourably and responsibly and intended to continue in the police force.

Held – (i) The wife would suffer grave financial hardship if the marriage were dissolved; although the loss of the police widow's pension was contingent on her surviving the husband and the contingency was remote in time, her loss of possible future security after the husband's death was a grave hardship when considered in the light of her probable financial stringency after the age of 60 (see p 415 h and j, post).

(ii) Nevertheless this contingent loss and other financial losses flowing from dissolution could be offset out of the husband's financial resources by means of the purchase a of a deferred annuity or of a policy producing a specified minimum sum on maturity; furthermore it was feasible for the husband to secure his obligation to make the annual premium payments by means of a second mortgage on his house, his ability to give that security being fundamental to the decision that he was capable of compensating for the security afforded by the police widow's pension (see p 416 a to d, post).

b (iii) Since the wife had herself obtained a non-cohabitation order dissolution could not reasonably be regarded as itself a hardship; accordingly, there being no other circumstances of hardship resulting from dissolution it was unnecessary to consider whether it would, in all the circumstances, be wrong to dissolve the marriage and accordingly a decree would be granted (see p 416 e, post).

c Per Cumming-Bruce J. A respondent on whom the onus of proving grave financial hardship lies should, by pleading, set forth the facts relied on. If the petitioner seeks to confess and avoid the financial hardship, he should plead the facts of confession and avoidance by reply. When a party seeks information as to the relevant financial circumstances of the other, the procedure should be to enquire by letter and then, if necessary, to obtain the information by reliance on interrogatories and discovery of documents (see p 413 d and e, post).

The husband petitioned for a decree of divorce on the ground that his marriage to the wife had irretrievably broken down and the parties had lived apart for a continuous period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. The facts are set out in the judgment.

f R L Johnson for the husband.
D J Mellor for the wife.

CUMMING-BRUCE J. This is a petition by a husband under s 2 (1) (e) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, whereby he seeks dissolution on the ground that the parties were married but lived apart for a continuous period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

g The wife opposes the grant of a decree nisi, pursuant to s 4 (1) of the 1969 Act, on the ground that the dissolution of the marriage will result in grave financial or other hardship to her and that it would be wrong in all the circumstances to dissolve the marriage. By her answer the wife pleads the facts on which she relies. She pleads h that she was a loyal, faithful and good wife to the husband, bore him two children and brought them up in a respectable and decent home until, in 1963 and 1964, the husband formed an association with another lady, committed adultery with her and broke up the home; that since he left her, the husband has incurred further financial responsibility by setting up a home with that lady, begetting a child by her, and generally giving her financial preference over the wife and her children. She alleges j that if dissolution is granted, it is likely that the husband will marry that lady and thus further the financial preference she and her child already enjoy. The wife alleges that if a dissolution is granted, she will lose pension rights under the police pension scheme and will have to pay higher contributions and receive a lower rate of pension in respect of her state retirement pension.

By s 4 (2) of the 1969 Act, in this situation it is my duty to consider all the circumstances, including the conduct of the parties to the marriage and the interests of those parties and of any children or other persons concerned, and if I am of opinion that the dissolution of the marriage will result in grave financial or other hardship to the respondent and that it would in all the circumstances be wrong to dissolve the marriage, it is my duty to dismiss the petition. The Act enacts that, for the purposes of the section, 'hardship' shall include the loss of the chance of acquiring any benefit which the respondent might acquire if the marriage were not dissolved. As a matter of construction, I take the view that the adjective 'grave' qualifies both 'financial' and 'other hardship'. In a case in which I am satisfied that the only fact mentioned in s 2 (1) on which the petitioner is entitled to rely in support of the petition is that mentioned in para (e), and that if apart from the section the court would grant a decree nisi, then I have to embark on the duty specified in the remaining words of the section. Here there is no issue on the fact of parting and separation for the relevant period, and I am satisfied that the only fact mentioned in s 2 (1) on which the petitioner is entitled to rely in support of his petition is that mentioned in para (e). I am also satisfied that, apart from s 4, this court would grant a decree nisi.

The first matter on which the court has to form an opinion is whether the dissolution of the marriage will result in grave financial or other hardship to the respondent wife. It is only if the court is of such opinion that it is then necessary to proceed to the next stage and to consider whether it would in all the circumstances be wrong to dissolve the marriage.

It is important, in applying s 4, to have in mind the provisions of s 6 of the 1969 Act, which afford protection for a respondent in certain cases by imposing on the court the duty not to make absolute a decree of divorce unless (inter alia) it is satisfied that the financial provision made by the petitioner for the respondent is reasonable and fair or the best that can be made in the circumstances. There is an obvious contrast between the language of s 6 (2) (b) and the language of s 4 (2), for in s 6 (2) (b) the protection is limited by the words (inter alia) that a decree absolute may be made if the court is satisfied that 'the financial provision . . . is . . . the best that can be made in the circumstances', and there may well be situations in which, though the financial provision may be the best that can be made in the circumstances, dissolution of the marriage will nonetheless result in grave financial or other hardship to the respondent.

The machinery for assessment of financial provision is s 5 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. By that section, the matters that the court has to regard in relation to assessment of financial provision are set out, and the duty of the court is:

' . . . so to exercise those powers as to place the parties, so far as it is practicable and, having regard to their conduct, just to do so, in the financial position in which they would have been if the marriage had not broken down and each had properly discharged his or her financial obligations and responsibilities towards the other.'

The words of great practical importance in that section are 'so far as it is practicable', because, when the court comes to exercise the powers under s 5 of the 1970 Act, it frequently is not practicable to place the parties in anything like the situation in which they would have been if the marriage had not broken down, and the result of the best financial provision that the court can make frequently is such as to involve a respondent wife in grave financial hardship.

As a matter of construction the court must, on the evidence, irrespective of what is practicable by way of financial provision, determine whether grave financial hardship will be caused to the respondent as a result of dissolution. It is first necessary, on the facts of the case, where s 4 (1) is in point, to determine whether the facts relevant to assessment of financial provision are such that, if the marriage is dissolved, grave financial hardship will result. This involves an enquiry into means carried to the point of appreciating the limits within which the court will have the opportunity

a of arriving at a determination under s 5 of the 1970 Act. The enquiry in proceedings for dissolution will not have to anticipate the actual determination of the orders that the court will subsequently make under s 5 if a decree nisi is pronounced.

The duty is to consider all the circumstances, including the conduct of the parties and the interests of any children or other persons concerned. Here, the wife has alleged matters of conduct of the husband in her answer, and the husband in correspondence has stated that he will rely on certain matters of conduct of the wife. b There are no specific rules of court specifying the matters of which parties should expressly give notice in their pleadings under ss 2 (1) (e) and 4 of the 1969 Act; and I am diffident, after the experience of a single case, to state what such rules might be. It appears to me to be desirable that if either party intends to rely on any matter of misconduct of the other party, or any other particular circumstance which is alleged c to be relevant to the court's consideration, the other party should be given notice thereof in sufficient time to enable the allegation to be investigated and rebutted. How far this should be by pleading, as compared to notice by letter, I prefer to leave to the judgment of practitioners, as I do not wish anything in this judgment to encourage the belief that a prolix pleading of the matrimonial history is necessary or desirable.

d Similar considerations apply to the pleading of facts material to grave financial hardship. A respondent on whom the onus of proving grave financial hardship lies should, by pleading, set forth the facts relied on. If the petitioner seeks to confess and avoid the financial hardship, he should plead the facts of confession and avoidance by reply. Where a party seeks information as to the relevant financial circumstances of the other, the procedure should be to enquire by letter and then, if necessary, to obtain the information by reliance on interrogatories and discovery of documents. e Counsel for the husband in this case made a reasonable complaint that the wife had failed to disclose her capital and income right up to the hearing of the case, although pressed to do so since 25th January 1971. This was a wholly justified complaint, although faced with the wife's silence, no application was made for discovery. If an adjournment had been necessary to discover and check the information, the wife f might have had to pay the costs occasioned thereby. The wife also herself came under suspicion that she, by want of candour, was making it as difficult as possible for the husband and the court to discover relevant truth. But, having heard her evidence, I acquit her of deliberate concealment.

I come to the facts relevant to my consideration of the circumstances. There was a conflict of evidence between the parties on the factors which contributed to the breakdown of the marriage. The view I formed should emerge from my findings g of fact. Both parties were to some degree blind to the difficulties which the other had experienced in the marriage.

The parties were married on 24th June 1949. The husband, then aged 22, was employed as a clerk. The wife was 24. Their daughter was born in 1951. Their son was born in 1958. Since 1951 the husband has been a police officer. Prior to the parting, he had been a detective sergeant and had reason to have been commended h for his part in investigating a case of very great complexity. The parties had to overcome, if they could, some difficulties. The wife felt that she was not sufficiently appreciated and felt that the husband could have spent more time with her and taken more trouble to make her happy. When aggrieved, she was liable to withdraw into silences, sometimes protracted, which lack of communication rebounded on the husband's capacity for affection. Though he was considerate in his physical j demands, his libido was stronger than hers and he resented the restrained degree to which she was able to participate in physical enjoyment. This was a misfortune for which neither should feel any sense of guilt. He was upset by what he recognised as her unfounded suspicions of a harmless social relationship, suspicions which probably had their origin in part in her feeling that there must be an extraneous explanation for the fact that he did not keep her company as much as she had hoped that he would. Her remarks about that wounded him and damaged their relationship at a moment when the emotional bond between them was fragile. a

In early 1962 he became friendly with the lady with whom he has been cohabiting since September 1964. He began an affair. The wife discovered it. He half-heartedly hoped to continue to maintain the marriage as long as the children were their mutual responsibility and made promises to his wife which he failed to honour. On first discovery of the affair, she was shocked and immensely distressed. Her first reaction was to offer him a divorce; but when he evinced a desire to keep the marriage alive and promised to put the other woman away, she changed her mind. He did not keep his promises, and continued to deceive her. Finally, she became, not surprisingly, very embittered at his clandestine double life, told him that the marriage was finished and told him to leave. I was not satisfied that the husband's view of the degree to which she, during this period, undermined his determination to continue the marriage was a reliable picture of the contemporary situation. They parted. She wrote a complaint about his matrimonial misconduct to his chief constable. Although her primary object was to cause the chief constable to do something to stop him living with his lady friend, she appreciated at the time that there was a risk that the effect might be that her husband would have to leave the force. There was also an element of persecution in the two postcards which she sent to him at his police station. She decided not to divorce him, although she had given up all hope of future cohabitation. She obtained a matrimonial order on 24th September 1964, with a non-cohabitation clause, with a £6 order for maintenance for herself and £2 10s for each of the two children. Later the financial provision was varied, and at present periodical payments run at 5 guineas for herself and £2.50 for the son. The girl is now grown up. At no stage was there such misconduct on the wife's part as would prejudice her right to maintenance or other financial provision. b

The wife began to go out to work, which she had never expected to do again, and has been employed since as an auxiliary nurse. Her present gross wages are £17.60; take-home pay £13. She lives in a council house at a rent of £4.50. I accepted her evidence of outgoings and drawings of savings. There is no element of extravagance in her modest way of life, and she has organised her budget so as to build up a small savings fund as described. I am not satisfied that religious principle played any part in her opposition to divorce. Her anxiety about her loss of pension is now genuine, though in her bitterness in 1964 she was prepared to imperil it. In her present employment she is entitled to a pension presently assessed at £2.60 at the age of 60—that is in 13 years' time, if she continues working for the regional hospital board—together with a lump sum tax-free payment of £446. She pays superannuation deduction and is buying these benefits by her own efforts. c

The financial benefits which she will or may lose on divorce are as follows: loss of widow's state pension after the husband's death; loss of widow's police pension after the husband's death. As a single woman, she must pay 75p a week more on her stamp. If out of work, she is liable to pay 94p on her stamp, which would be recouped by supplementary benefit if she was entitled to such benefit. The loss of entitlement to police widow's pension is much the most important element of contingent loss. Particulars were given by Mr Brooks, who is skilled in local government and police superannuation, on the pension benefits which would be available to her on the death of her husband. (1) If the husband dies in police service, on his present salary today (which I hope will not happen) her pension would be £186. (2) If he leaves the force in the next five years, no widow's pension right survives. (3) In five years time he will have served 25 years' service. On his death then, she has a vested right in the value of £319, whether he is still in the force or not. (4) The maximum pension, if he serves 30 years, would be £425. d

These figures are subject to three possible uplifting factors. (1) The pension is founded on the average of the last three years pay before death, or retirement after 25 years. The salary has been increased by a third over the last three years, and the e a trend has been for percentage increments to increase. (2) Actual pensions qualify for upwards review at two-yearly intervals under the Pensions (Increase) Act 1971, which is designed to take account of inflation. (3) If he is promoted, there will be a rise in the scale of salary to which the pension is related. His intentions are, of course, relevant. He could leave the force today and defeat altogether her claim to loss of contingent widow's pension; but he is not so irresponsible. On the contrary. Save for the unfortunate fact that he has left the wife to live with another lady, he has throughout behaved honourably and with a high sense of responsibility.

b The facts about his situation are these. He has continued, and intends to continue, in the police force. After the wife made representations to his chief constable, he was moved to a new post and relegated from being a detective sergeant to being a uniformed sergeant, at a financial loss of £4 a week. He has since passed the examination for the rank of inspector, but he has never been promoted. I heard no evidence c from his superiors about his prospects for promotion, and I must be careful about this. He said that the varied experience that he has had in the last few years is probably a long-term advantage to his prospects of promotion. My conclusion, which I hope is not incautious, is: (a) the irregularity of his matrimonial affairs in 1962 to 1964 d caused, or strongly influenced, demotion; (b) probably the continuing irregularity of his domestic life has prejudiced his chances of promotion since. As a matter of probability, if he can marry again, his prospects of promotion will improve and, in view of the ability which won him commendation in the very difficult assignment which he carried out ten years ago, I would expect him to be promoted if he re-married. But the promotion which he may attain is irrelevant to the quantum of her loss of pension rights resulting from dissolution, as it appears that he would be unlikely to be promoted if the irregularity of his present home-life continued indefinitely. e It may be relevant to his capacity to earn enough money to arrange in the future for financial arrangements which might benefit the wife. He is living in a house which he is buying on mortgage, bought in 1962 for £3,400, on a 100 per cent mortgage which he is repaying at the rate of £27.50 per month. With him f lives his lady friend, known locally as 'Mrs Parker', single, ready and eager to marry. They have a child aged three. They have lately taken into their family his granddaughter, as it is not easy for the parent to look after her. They intend to make this child permanently part of their family without financial aid from the parent. This shows an admirable devotion to family responsibility.

His gross pay and allowances are £186.86 per month, including a rent allowance which covers his mortgage outgoings. I do not deal with other details of his finances. I accepted his evidence; and they are set out accurately in his solicitors' letter about g it. He has a car, in which he travels daily to work, which costs him round about £9 a month on expenses. If the awkwardness of his domestic situation is eliminated, those journeys might also be eliminated. I do not know. By house purchase, he is building up a capital asset, from which the lady whom he hopes to marry may eventually benefit; and if they marry, she will gain the contingent security of the police widow's pension which the wife will lose on dissolution.

h On these facts, I am satisfied that the wife will suffer grave financial hardship if the marriage is dissolved. Although the loss of the police widow's pension is contingent on her surviving him, and although the contingency may be regarded, on a scrutiny of actuarial averages, as remote in time, her loss of possible future security after the death of the husband, at a time when she will most need it, is a grave hardship when considered in the light of her probable financial stringency after the age of 60; that i is, in 13 years time. And I take this view in spite of the recognition that, in the bitterness of the breakdown of her family life, she was prepared to intervene with the police authority in a way that carried the risk of destroying her pension prospects at a stroke. I am not surprised that she was tormented at the humiliating prospect of a younger woman reigning in her stead when she had borne two children and loyally seen the family through 12 formative years. The changing manners reflected in the 1969 Act afford no index to the real pain suffered by some individual women such as this wife. a

But, although there is no pleaded case to this effect, I am satisfied that the contingent loss of benefit from police widow's pension can be offset out of the husband's financial resources. I am satisfied on the evidence that I have heard of financial resources and from statements tendered at the Bar on the cost of endowment policies designed to offset the contingent loss of police widow's pension by purchase of a deferred annuity or of a policy producing a specified minimum sum on maturity at a future date that compensation can be given to the wife for the loss of contingent police pension rights and other losses which she has proved as flowing from dissolution. b

There is, however, a further problem: can the court be confident that the husband will maintain the annual premium payments which must continue unbroken for the period specified in the policy? Without such confidence, there is a risk that the grant of compensating benefits under a policy of insurance will be frustrated. In this case, on the evidence and statements from the Bar which I have heard, I am satisfied that it is feasible for the husband to secure his obligation to make annual premium payments by means of a second mortgage on his house, and his ability to give that security is fundamental to my decision that he is capable of compensating for the security afforded by the police widow's pension by a policy of insurance. c

It is unnecessary at this stage of the proceedings to determine how it should be done, or whether it should be done. Those matters will arise for determination on the proceedings under s 5 of the 1970 Act. It is enough for the purposes of my opinion under s 2 (2) of the 1969 Act that resources are available which enable compensation for the contingent loss to be achieved, so that dissolution of itself will not result in grave financial hardship to the widow. d

There are no other circumstances of hardship, grave or otherwise, resulting from dissolution. Where a wife has herself obtained a non-cohabitation order seven years ago, formal dissolution cannot reasonably be regarded itself as a hardship unless there are factors present which do not exist in this case. It is therefore unnecessary for me to form an opinion whether it would, in all the circumstances, be wrong to dissolve the marriage. Obiter, my opinion is that it is not wrong. e

There will be a decree nisi under s 2 (1) (e) of the 1969 Act. I reserve to myself proceedings under s 5 of the 1970 Act, and adjourn those proceedings to chambers. f

It is for consideration whether the appropriate procedure in a case involving an allegation of grave financial hardship is to cause the notice under s 6 of the 1969 Act to be served and to consolidate the proceedings thereon with the proceedings on the petition for dissolution. Although I decided that that course was unnecessary on the evidence which I heard in this case, it may sometimes be the best practicable way of safeguarding the financial future of the respondent. g

Decree nisi.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, SACHS AND STAMP LJJ

22nd, 25th, 26th OCTOBER, 30th NOVEMBER 1971

- b* Bill of exchange – Notice of dishonour – Validity – Time – Premature notice – Effect – Notice of dishonour given before bill dishonoured – ‘Given’ – Notice sent by post – Notice posted by holder day before bill dishonoured – Notice received by drawer on same day that bill dishonoured – Onus of proving that notice received after presentation and dishonour – Whether notice given when posted or when received – Whether notice which states incorrectly when posted that bill ‘has been dishonoured’ validated if dishonour taking place whilst notice in course of post – Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s 49.

d On 28th August 1970 the defendants drew a bill of exchange, payable four months after date, on F Ltd which owed them money. The bill was accepted by F Ltd payable at Lloyds Bank Ltd, Desborough Road, High Wycombe. The defendants, having indorsed the bill in blank, took it to the plaintiffs who discounted it, thereby becoming holders of the bill for value. Within a few weeks F Ltd went into liquidation. Both the plaintiffs and the defendants knew of the liquidation, and knew that in consequence the bill, when presented to the bank, would be dishonoured. The bill was duly despatched by the plaintiffs and received by Lloyds Bank at High Wycombe on the due date, 31st December. During the course of business on that day the bank marked the bill ‘Refer to Acceptor, Company in Liquidation’, and returned it to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, knowing that the bill would be dishonoured, had previously drawn up a letter addressed to the defendants stating: ‘Please take notice that the [bill of exchange] has been dishonoured by non-payment, and we request immediate settlement from you.’ The letter was dated 1st January 1971 but, through inadvertence, the plaintiffs posted it on 30th December 1970. It was received by the defendants in the first post on the morning of 31st December. No other notice of dishonour was given by the plaintiffs. In an action by the plaintiffs on the bill the defendants contended that, by virtue of s 48^a of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882, they were not liable since the notice of dishonour, having been given before the bill had in fact been dishonoured, was not a valid and effectual notice within s 49^b of the 1882 Act.

Held (Lord Denning MR dissenting) – The plaintiffs’ action should be dismissed for the following reasons—

- g* (i) in no circumstances could an action be brought on a bill of exchange unless notice of dishonour had been given; knowledge on the part of the defendant that a Section 48, so far as material, provides: ‘Subject to the provisions of this Act, when a bill has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or by non-payment, notice of dishonour must be given to the drawer and each indorser, and any drawer or indorser to whom such notice is not given is discharged . . .’

- h* b Section 49, so far as material provides: ‘Notice of dishonour in order to be valid and effectual must be given in accordance with the following rules:— . . . (5) The notice may be given in writing or by personal communication, and may be given in any terms which sufficiently identify the bill, and intimate that the bill has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment . . . (12) The notice may be given as soon as the bill is dishonoured and must be given within a reasonable time thereafter. In the absence of special circumstances notice is not deemed to have been given within a reasonable time, unless—(a) where the person giving and the person to receive notice reside in the same place, the notice is given or sent off in time to reach the latter on the day after the dishonour of the bill. (b) where the person giving and the person to receive notice reside in different places, the notice is sent off on the day after the dishonour of the bill, if there be a post at a convenient hour on that day, and if there be no post on that day then by the next post thereafter . . .’

the bill had been dishonoured without notification thereof was of no effect; furthermore notice of dishonour could not be given until the bill had in fact been dishonoured; the onus lay on the plaintiff to prove that notice had been given in due time and before the action was brought (see p 424 f to h, p 425 b and c, and p 427 d and e, post); statement in Byles on Bills, 22nd Edn, pp 147, 148, approved;

(ii) there were no grounds for the contention that a notice of dishonour was not 'given' until it had been received and that, therefore, the notice given by the plaintiffs was not given until 31st December; where the notice was sent through the post the bill must already have been dishonoured at the time when the notice was despatched (see p 425 e and h and p 428 b, post); Fielding & Co v Corry [1898] 1 QB 268 distinguished;

(iii) in any event, even if a notice was not 'given' until it had been received, the onus was on the plaintiffs affirmatively to prove that the time when the bill was presented to and dishonoured by the bank on 31st December preceded the moment when the notice of dishonour was received through the post by the defendants on that day; there was no irrebuttable presumption that, where two events had taken place on the same day, they had occurred in proper sequence; nor was there any rule relating to the reckoning of parts of a day applicable to the present case; on the evidence the plaintiffs had failed to discharge the onus of proving that the notice of dishonour had been received by the defendants after the bill had been dishonoured (see p 426 b f and g and p 429 f, post); Castrique v Bernabo (1844) 6 QB 498 applied; Aikman v Conway (1837) 3 M & W 71 distinguished;

(iv) furthermore, a statement in a notice posted on 30th December which on its true construction meant that a bill had been dishonoured on or before that day did not acquire a different meaning because as a matter of law the notice containing the statement was not 'given' until the following day; being an incorrect statement that something had happened on or before 30th December it could not be regarded as a correct statement of something that happened on the following day; since the purported notice did not have the necessary characteristic of a notice of dishonour, that it should correctly state, not that the bill would be dishonoured, but that it had been dishonoured, it followed that no notice of dishonour had been given (see p 426 j to p 427 a and p 428 c to e, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by the defendants, J Needham Builders Ltd, against the judgment of Donaldson J given on the trial of the action on 28th May 1971 whereby it was adjudged that the plaintiffs, Eaglehill Ltd, were entitled to £7,660 against the defendants as drawers of a bill of exchange for such sum which was dishonoured by non-payment on 31st December 1970 (being the last day of grace), and that a notice of dishonour given to the defendants by a letter received by the defendants on 31st December 1970 constituted a valid notice of dishonour although given on the same day as the dishonour of the bill. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

Cur adv vult

30th November. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR.

e 1. Introductory

- In this case the plaintiffs have all the merits. They are the holders for value of a bill of exchange for over £7,000. The defendants are the drawers of the bill. The bill was dishonoured. The plaintiffs gave the defendants notice of dishonour, but they sent it off a day too soon; and, as it happened, the post office took only one day to deliver it instead of two days. Owing to this expeditious delivery by the post office, the defendants say that they are exempt from all liability on the bill. They need not pay the £7,000 which they ought in justice to pay. There are no merits in this defence. But we have to consider whether it is good in law.

2. The facts

- g* The defendants, J Needham Builders Ltd, are a large company of builders carrying on business in Leigh Street, High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire. In August 1970 they were owed a lot of money by a company of furniture-makers called Fir View Furniture Co Ltd of Beech Road, Wycombe Marsh, High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire. In order to get payment, on 28th August 1970 J Needham Builders Ltd drew a bill of exchange on Fir View Furniture Co Ltd for £7,660, payable four months after date. I set it out:

- h* 'Bill for £7,660 os od. 28th August 1970
 Four months after date pay to us or our Order the sum of Seven thousand six hundred and sixty pounds only for Value received.
 To Fir View Furniture Co. Limited. For and on behalf of Beech Road, Wycombe Marsh, J. Needham Builders Ltd.
 High Wycombe, Bucks. A. D. Russell.
 Director.'

- j* Fir View Furniture Co Ltd accepted the bill stamping on it:

'ACCEPTED payable at Lloyds Bank Ltd. Desborough Road High Wycombe.
 p.p. Fir View Furniture Co. Ltd.
 Director: J Wheatley
 Secretary: J M Buckley.'

The director indorsed the bill in blank on the back by writing simply:

‘For and on behalf of J. Needham Builders Ltd.
A. D. Russell.
Director.’

By this indorsement in blank, the bill became payable to bearer. The drawers—J Needham Builders Ltd—took it along to a discount house, Eaglehill Ltd, the plaintiffs, who carry on business in Cannon Street in the City. They discounted the bill, that is to say, Eaglehill Ltd paid J Needham Builders Ltd the amount of the bill, less a discount, and became themselves the holders of the bill for value.

In the next few weeks the Fir View Furniture Co Ltd went into liquidation. Thenceforward they were unable to meet their obligations. If the bill was presented, it would inevitably be dishonoured. Both the holders and drawers knew this. But it was still necessary for the holders to present the bill for payment on the due date and to give notice of dishonour. I will take these two requirements in order.

3. Presentment for payment

The bill was payable four months after date, that is, after 28th August 1970. Allowing for the three days of grace, that meant that the bill was due and payable on 31st December 1970, which was a Thursday. It was absolutely necessary for the bill to be presented for payment on that day at Lloyds Bank, Desborough Road, High Wycombe. If it was not so presented, the drawers—J Needham Builders Ltd—would be discharged: see s 45 of the 1882 Act. Everyone knew beforehand that Fir View Furniture Co Ltd were in liquidation and that the bill would, on presentment, be dishonoured. But that did not dispense with the necessity for presentment: see s 46 (2) (a) of the 1882 Act.

The holders, or their bankers, sent the bill by post to Lloyds Bank Ltd, Desborough Road, High Wycombe. It arrived there by the first post on the due date—31st December 1970. The bank manager gave this description of what they did with it:

‘The Bill in question was received by us at the commencement of business. We were aware that Fir View Furniture Company Ltd, upon whom the Bill was drawn were in liquidation and during the course of the day the Bill was marked, “Refer to Acceptor, Company in Liquidation”. We cannot be specific as to the actual time that the Bill was marked during the course of the day’s business but would not have awaited the close of business before so doing in view of the liquidation of Fir View. Had an enquiry been made during the course of the day’s business by another Bank, the enquirer would have been told that the Bill had been dishonoured.’

It is plain, therefore, that the bill was duly presented for payment on the due date and was dishonoured on that day. But at what time was it dishonoured? If the bill had arrived at the bank on 29th or 30th December, the bank would receive it as agent for presentation to itself: see *Bailey v Bodenham*¹. It would be its duty to hold it until the due date, 31st December, and present it to itself at the commencement of business on that day. But, seeing that it arrived on the morning of the due date, 31st December, the bank did not receive it as agent for presentation to itself. The bill was duly presented to the bank, through the post, at the commencement of business on that day. The bill was not then paid. It was then and there dishonoured. The time of dishonour was the commencement of business on that day—I presume 9.30 a.m. Later on that day the bill was marked ‘Refer to Acceptor, Company in liquidation’. But that was only a way of noting the dishonour. The bill had already been dishonoured at the commencement of business at 9.30 a.m.

a 4. The need to give notice of dishonour

Although the drawer, J Needham Builders Ltd, knew perfectly well that Fir View Furniture Co Ltd were in liquidation and that the bill would be dishonoured on presentation, nevertheless it is settled law that the holder was bound to give the drawer notice of dishonour. Many judges have regretted this rule. In *Claridge v Dalton*² Bayley J said³: 'a party who cannot be prejudiced by want of notice, shall not be entitled to require it.' In *Carew v Duckworth*⁴, Bramwell B said⁵:

'The true rule should be, that no notice of dishonour is required where it would convey no information, that is, when the party sued knew beforehand that the bill would not be paid . . .'

But, in spite of all these regrets, the judges have felt bound to hold that 'knowledge of the probability, however strong, that a bill of exchange will be dishonoured, cannot operate a notice of dishonour or dispense with it', see *Caunt v Thompson*⁶. The editors of Smith's Leading Cases said this about it⁷:

'... it is difficult to see how the drawer could be prejudiced by want of notice, when the drawee had become bankrupt or notoriously insolvent. Yet in both these cases he was unquestionably entitled to it':

d see the notes to *Bickerdike v Bollman*⁸. The rule is now contained in s 48 of the 1882 Act which provides:

'... when a bill has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or by non-payment, notice of dishonour must be given to the drawer and each indorser, and any drawer or indorser to whom such notice is not given is discharged . . .'

e 5. The time for giving the notice of dishonour

The time for giving notice of dishonour starts at the very moment when the bill is dishonoured. In this case 9.30 a.m. on 31st December 1970. The holder can then at once give notice to the drawer. But he cannot bring an action against the drawer until the next day: see *Kennedy v Thomas*⁹. The time for giving notice ends within a reasonable time after the bill is dishonoured. When the parties live in the same place, a reasonable time includes the whole day after the dishonour, but no longer. When they live at different places, it includes the second day after the dishonour, but generally no longer. It may be given by messenger, by post, by telephone, by telegram or by telex. In this case the holders, Eaglehill Ltd, and the drawers, J Needham Builders Ltd, resided in different places. The holders in London. The drawers in High Wycombe. If sent by post, the latest time for giving notice of dishonour was by sending it off by post on the day after the dishonour of the bill, that is, on 1st January 1971 (see s 49 (12) (b) of the 1882 Act), so that it would, in the ordinary way, arrive next day, but the earliest time for giving notice was as soon as the bill was dishonoured, that is, at 9.30 a.m. on 31st December 1970.

6. The notice of dishonour here

The holders in London, knowing of the liquidation of the acceptor, made preparation to give notice of dishonour within the prescribed time. They drew up this letter:

Director'

If that letter had been posted on the date it bore, 1st January 1971, it would undoubtedly have been a good notice of dishonour: see s 49 (12) (b). If it had been posted on 31st December 1970 and received next day on 1st January 1971, it would also have been beyond doubt a good notice of dishonour. But the lady in the office was anxious to clear her desk and posted it one day early, that is, on 30th December 1970. She posted it about 5.00 pm on that day. If it had taken two days to get there, so that it arrived on 1st January 1971, it would have been a good notice of dishonour. But it took only one day. It arrived at the office of J Needham Builders Ltd at High Wycombe by the first post on the morning of 31st December 1970; and they stamped on it their receipt stamp: 'J. Needham Group 31st Dec 1970 Received'. Does that make it a bad notice of dishonour? That is the question.

7. What is meant by 'giving' notice of dishonour?

Sections 48 and 49 of the 1882 Act require that notice of dishonour must be 'given' to the drawer and each indorser, within a reasonable time. It seems to me that, according to the ordinary use of language, a notice is not 'given' to a man until he receives it. In this branch of the law, as in others, 'it is of the very essence of such notice that it should be communicated to or should reach the party concerned'; cf *Regina v Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, ex parte Rossi*¹⁰ per Morris LJ. Before the statute, it was held that when notice of dishonour is sent by post it is 'given' at the time when the letter is received by the person concerned, not at the time when it is sent off: see *Castrique v Bernabo*¹¹. Since the statute, it has been held that if the holder sends his letter to the wrong address but then sends a telegram to the right address which is received by the drawer at the time when a letter rightly addressed would have been delivered, it is a good notice: see *Fielding & Co v Corry*¹².

These cases accurately represent the law merchant. They show that a notice of dishonour is given by the holder to the drawer at the time when the drawer receives it; subject, however, to this exception: that, if the holder 'sends' it by post, so that in due course of delivery it would arrive in time, he is 'deemed' to have given due notice of discharge, notwithstanding that it is lost or delayed in the post; see *Stocken v Collin*¹³; s 49 (15) of the Act.

In this case we have a letter dated in advance '1st January, 1971' but posted on 30th December 1970. It might well have taken two days in transit, especially at that season of the year. If it had taken two days, and had reached the drawer on the morning of 1st January 1971, it would have been a perfectly good notice of dishonour. As it happened, however, the post office was on this occasion unusually expeditious. It delivered the letter on the morning of the due date, 31st December 1970. Does this expedition make the notice bad? I think not. It is clear law that a holder is not to a suffer owing to the delays of the post office. So also he should not suffer by its expedition.

8. Parts of a day

b The bill was received at Lloyds Bank, High Wycombe, by the first post on 31st December 1970. It was presented for payment at the commencement of business on that day—I presume 9.30 a.m.—and was at once dishonoured. The letter giving notice of dishonour was delivered to the premises of the drawers—J Needham Builders Ltd—at High Wycombe by the first post on 31st December 1970. We do not know when the letter was opened. When was the notice ‘received’? I should think at the commencement of business on that day, that is, when the post was opened and the letter put before a person in authority. I would expect it to be about 9.30 a.m. also. Which took place first, the dishonour or the notice of dishonour?

c It is suggested that we ought to look at the parts of a day, so as to ask this question: if the bill was dishonoured at the bank at 9.30 a.m. and the notice of dishonour received by the drawer at 9.31 a.m., the notice is good. But, if the notice of dishonour was received by the drawer at 9.29 a.m., it is bad.

d I decline to look into the times so narrowly. It is an absurd exercise. The law has long recognised the difficulty of getting evidence as to the exact time of day when any particular event takes place. For that reason it has laid down the general rule that the law does not have regard to parts of a day. When it is a question which of the two acts on one day was done first, it presumes that everything was done regularly. As Alderson B said in *Aikman v Conway*¹⁴:

e ‘It is a good rule, that when two things are done on the same day, that shall be presumed to have been done first which ought to be so.’

Seeing that the dishonour ought to take place before the notice of dishonour, we should presume that it did so. This rule was applied to bills of exchange by Megaw J in *Yeoman Credit v Gregory*¹⁵, when he expressed the view that a notice of dishonour was valid if given on the same day as the dishonour.

f Applying this principle, I am of opinion that we should presume that the bill was dishonoured at Lloyds Bank Ltd before the time when notice of dishonour was given to the drawers—J Needham Builders Ltd. So the notice of dishonour was good. This was the view of Donaldson J, and I entirely agree with it.

9. The contrary arguments

g As against these reasons, stress is laid on the words of s 48, which says that, when a bill has been dishonoured, notice of dishonour must be given to the drawer: and of s 49 (12), which says that the notice may be given as soon as the bill is dishonoured. It is said that the holder must not send off his notice of dishonour until after the bill has been dishonoured. I do not agree. The word ‘given’ in those sections does not mean ‘send off’. It means ‘received’. Notice is given to the drawer at the time when he receives the notice. It is permissible, therefore, to prepare the notice in advance, and to send it off beforehand. It is good so long as the drawer receives it after the bill is dishonoured.

h Scorn is levelled too at the lack of logic in the law which says (so it is supposed): if on the day before the due date a holder says truly to the drawer: ‘This bill will be dishonoured on presentation tomorrow’, it is a bad notice. But, if he says untruly: ‘This bill has been dishonoured’, and sends it off, it is a good notice. But this is answered again by remembering that it is not the sending off of the notice that matters. It is the receipt of it by the drawer. If the notice is true at the time when the drawer receives it, then it is a perfectly good notice. In the present case it was known to all that the bill would certainly be dishonoured on the due date. I see nothing untrue in preparing a notice in advance and posting it beforehand—so long as it is timed to arrive on the due date. By the time it arrives it is true. a

¹⁴ (1837) 3 M & W 71 at 72

Finally, it is said that the law must be clear and certain; and that, for this reason, it must hold this notice to be bad. But the law, as I consider it to be, is clear and certain. It says that a notice of dishonour is good if it is received on the same day as the dishonour. That is surely certain enough for anyone.

Conclusion b

Beyond any question, justice requires that the defendants should pay this bill of £7,660. They drew it and, by their indorsement, warranted that it would be met on presentation. Long before it was presented, they knew that the acceptor was insolvent. They knew it would not be met on presentation. It was not met on the due date. It was dishonoured. And on that very day the defendants received a letter telling them it had been dishonoured. But they now say to the holders: 'You posted your letter a day too soon. So we are discharged.' I have never met a more technical or unmeritorious defence. The commercial judge, who knows much about these matters, rejected it. So would I. I would dismiss this appeal. c

SACHS LJ. Despite the lack of merits on the side of the defendants, I am unable to agree that their appeal should be dismissed. d

The first point to be considered is counsel for the plaintiffs' contention that to establish the plaintiffs' cause of action it is not necessary to prove that the defendants were given due notice of dishonour; it was suggested that in law an action could be commenced in certain circumstances before such notice had been given. This submission, as he rightly conceded, runs quite contrary to the general view of the profession, to the writings in all textbooks both new and old, and to well-established decisions such as *May v Cridley*¹⁶. It is sufficient to refer to Byles on Bills¹⁷ where the law is stated in precisely the same terms as it was in the 10th edition (1870) of that authoritative work. The relevant paragraph states: e

'It lies on the plaintiff to show that notice was given in due time and before action brought.' f

One of the cases cited is *Lawson v Sherwood*¹⁸ where Lord Ellenborough said:

'The onus probandi lies upon the plaintiff, and since he had not proved due notice he must be called.' g

That is a correct statement of the law as it is and has been for over a century; the contrary submission fails.

The constituents of the due notice which the plaintiffs must prove have since 1882 been laid down by the Bills of Exchange Act of that year. It is clear that the notice must follow after the dishonour. Section 55 (1) (a) enacts, so far as is relevant, that the drawer of the bill by drawing it: h

'Engages that on due presentment it shall be . . . paid . . . and that if it be dishonoured he will compensate the holder . . . provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour be duly taken'.

Unless the procedure laid down in s 49 is followed, the liability does not arise—the contingent liability does not crystallise. j

When considering the effect of the relevant provisions of the Act it is at all stages necessary to bear in mind that, as stated in Byles¹⁹:

16 [1894] 1 QB 451

17 22nd Edn, p 157

18 (1816) 1 Stark 314 at 315

19 Byles on Bills, 22nd Edn, pp 147, 148

- a 'Notice does not mean mere knowledge but actual notification, for a man who can be clearly shown to have known beforehand that the bill would be dishonoured is nevertheless entitled to notice.'

That has been the law at any rate since 1849 (cf *Caunt v Thompson*²⁰). Notice before dishonour has no effect. In this behalf it is to be noted that s 48 says in the plainest terms:

- b '... when a bill has been dishonoured by ... non-payment, notice of dishonour must be given to the drawer ... and any drawer ... to whom such notice is not given is discharged ...'

The words in italics are reinforced by the provisions, inter alia, of s 49 (see, for instance, r (12)).

- c It being thus clear that the notice must be subsequent to the dishonour, it is in my judgment impossible to say that a notice despatched before the due date and received before the presentation for payment can constitute due notice. I reject the submission (made primarily in connection with counsel for the plaintiffs' first contention) that a notice proved both to have been sent before and also received before the dishonour took place could be regarded as due notice.

- d In thus stating my opinion on the law I have so far refrained from canvassing whether as regards notice being 'given' the moment of time to be considered is that when the notice is sent or that when it is received, or both; that point is immaterial on the conclusions as to the facts under consideration which I am about to relate. Having, however, had the advantage of reading the judgment about to be delivered by Stamp LJ it is as well to state that I am disposed to agree with what he has said on that matter. *Fielding & Co v Corry*²¹, on which the defendants relied, does not appear to me to be an authority to the contrary—indeed it deals with very special facts. There a notice despatched after dishonour had been addressed to the wrong branch of a bank, but was followed by a telegram to the correct branch of the same bank; the majority of the court held that there had been good notice. A L Smith LJ was of the opinion¹ that an address mistake could be rectified. Rigby LJ stated²:

- f '... it is not material that the notice has been wrongly addressed, provided that this has not prevented it getting to the proper person within the proper time';

whilst Collins LJ, when dissenting, said³:

- g 'The point on which I differ is the question whether different branches of a bank are to be treated as one and the same person for the purpose of giving and receiving notice of dishonour.'

On balance it seems that this decision tends against the proposition that all that matters is the time of receipt of the notice. On the footing that the Act requires any notice to be both despatched and received after dishonour, the plaintiffs' claim would, of course, clearly fail.

- h Turning now to the facts of the instant case, it is convenient first to examine what would be the position if (contrary to my view) the onus lies on the defendants to show that notice was received after the presentation. The two relevant buildings—the offices of the defendants in Leigh Street and the premises of Lloyds Bank in Desborough Road—were only about 100 yards apart. On the facts as set out in the agreed statement it is definitely on balance of probabilities more likely that the notice of dishonour reached the defendants before the bill of exchange got to the stage of being dishonoured rather than after that moment; so the defendants could properly claim to have discharged the assumed onus. The earliest reasonable time for presentation must either be 9.30 a.m. (the commencement of normal banking hours) or some time between 9.00 a.m. and 9.30 a.m., leaving sufficient time for the mail to be opened and reach whatever member of the staff has to take action on it; even in 1970 postal deliveries at business premises in the centre of a town (e.g. the defendants' premises) normally take place before 9.00 a.m., i.e. before the time of presentation. a

As, however, the onus in my judgment lies on the plaintiffs affirmatively to prove that the notice relied on was after presentation, then, of course, they are in even greater difficulties—for clearly they cannot be said to have discharged such a burden. b

It follows that the plaintiffs must fail unless they can substantiate one or more of their other contentions. Of these the most strongly pressed was the submission that when two events take place on the same day there was an irrebuttable presumption that they occur in proper sequence and that accordingly the notice of dishonour must in that case be presumed to have arrived at the plaintiffs' premises after the time of dishonour. For this proposition the plaintiffs relied solely on *Aikman v Conway*⁴. There it was laid down that the practice in the office of the Court of Queen's Bench in effect produced such a presumption in regard to the rules of pleading. The court had sent to enquire the practice and Parke B said⁵: c

'Master Le Blanc certifies to us, that if both acts are done on the same day, there is no irregularity. . .'

Alderson B then gave his judgment in the terms cited by Lord Denning MR. Basing himself on that authority, counsel for the plaintiffs went so far as to submit that even if it were conclusively proved that a notice of dishonour reached a drawer's office at 8.00 a.m. and that the relevant bill was presented at 3.00 p.m., the notice must be presumed to have been given after the presentation. To my mind *Aikman v Conway*⁴ simply is not in point in relation to the mercantile law relating to bills of exchange; that indeed was decided as long ago as *Castrique v Bernabo*⁶, when the submission now made by counsel for the plaintiffs was rejected in the days when letters posted in the city of London before 3.00 p.m. were delivered in Oxford Street before 6.00 p.m. I firmly decline to hold that this court is bound to come to any conclusions contrary to the truth. There may well come a case where a presumption arises that events relating to a bill of exchange have occurred in due sequence, but it could not apply to the instant facts nor could it be irrebuttable. e

Similarly, with all respect to those who may be disposed to a contrary view, as was Megaw J speaking obiter in *Yeoman Credit Ltd v Gregory*⁷, I find myself unable to see that there exists any rule relating to the reckoning of parts of a day that applies in the instant case. Indeed, with all respect to what has been said as to 'parts of a day not counting', I cannot accept that this concept can be prayed in aid by the plaintiffs, nor the suggestion that whereas an anticipatory notice given three days in advance of dishonour is bad, yet when given three hours in advance it is good. f

Finally should be mentioned counsel for the plaintiffs' gloomy prognostications of mercantile difficulties in these days of timed telex notices of dishonour if the plaintiffs' contentions were not accepted. These failed to impress me, for in at least 99.99 per cent of cases the mere fact that a telex notice states that dishonour has occurred enables it to be said by the sender—as would be accepted by a court—'of course I only gave the notice when I knew it had occurred'. Quite contrary to that submission on behalf of the plaintiffs I would deprecate the confusion which would be introduced into the law by finding in their favour. In that event it would be necessary to hold that a notice which stated facts that to the knowledge of the recipient must have been untrue when it was sent, and which in essence was at best g a saying 'The bill will be dishonoured in our opinion' can by some alchemy of the courts be transformed into a notice that complied with the provisions of the 1882 Act despite the rule in *Caunt v Thompson*⁸. Here again I would record my respectful agreement with the judgment about to be delivered by Stamp LJ. Such a holding would breed confusion. The Act has many provisions that can result in hard cases owing to mistake in an office; but it has the outstanding merit of providing clear and certain law on which a busy mercantile community can know exactly where it stands.

b It is now a very long time since Lord Mansfield stressed the importance of certainty in the law merchant. For well over a century there has been certainty that to establish due notice of dishonour it must be shown that it was notice after presentment and dishonour. In this technical sphere of the law merchant it would be no good service to introduce complexity and uncertainty by grafting artificial exceptions on to a well-known rule—exceptions moreover which run contrary to the plain meaning of the words of the 1882 Act and which would make an inroad on its provisions.

c I would accordingly allow the appeal.

STAMP LJ. In my judgment no effective notice of dishonour of the bill here in question was ever given.

d However informal a notice of dishonour may be, and I accept that it may be given in the most informal way and in the most informal terms; it must at least be couched in such terms that the recipient knows that the bill has been dishonoured. Nothing less than that will do: see *Hartley v Case*⁹ and r (5) of s 49 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882. It is common ground that a statement that the bill will be dishonoured will not do however certain the happening of that event may be.

e The notice relied on by the plaintiffs as notice that the bill had been dishonoured said 'Please take notice that the undernoted Bill(s) of Exchange has been dishonoured by non-payment'. The notice, received as it was by the defendants by the first post on 31st December 1970, could only have been sent not later than the previous day and according to the ordinary meaning of the English language the statement in it that the bill had been dishonoured meant, and could only mean, that this had happened

f not later than the previous day. The bill had not in fact been dishonoured on the previous day and if the matter rested there, the statement in the notice that the bill had been dishonoured being an erroneous statement, could not be a notice of dishonour. An incorrect intimation that the bill has been dishonoured by non-payment cannot satisfy the requirements of r (5) of s 49. The parties being both aware that the bill did not become payable until 31st December and that it would then be dishonoured, the defendants might no doubt have regarded the notice as a notice that the bill would be dishonoured on presentation; but, as I have said, such a notice is not a good notice of dishonour.

g What is submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs is that a notice of dishonour is not 'given' until it is received, and because by the time this notice was received the bill must, so it is said, be taken to have been dishonoured, the statement in it that the bill had been dishonoured had become a true statement so that the notice was a notice of dishonour.

h The authorities most relied on in support of the proposition that notice is not given until it is received were *Castrique v Bernabo*¹⁰ and *Fielding & Co v Corry*¹¹. The former case is in my judgment authority for no more than that where a writ is issued before receipt of the notice of dishonour, the cause of action is not complete. In the latter case a letter containing a notice of dishonour was sent off in due time to the wrong branch of the bank. It was followed by a telegram sent off too late to the correct branch of the bank correcting the error. It was held by A L Smith LJ¹² that it would be frittering away the provisions of the Act if a mistake in the address could not be rectified, if the effect of the rectification is that the person to whom notice is sent in point of fact gets notice in due course and in due time. Rigby LJ¹³ held that it was not material that the notice had been wrongly addressed provided this did not prevent it getting there. I find nothing in either of the cases relied on to support the submission that a notice 'sent off'—I quote the words of paragraphs (a) and (b) of r (12) of s 49—on one day is not given until the day it is received. Assuming, however, that for some purpose a notice of dishonour does fall to be treated as given at the time it is received, it does not follow that for all purposes it falls to be so treated or as not coming into existence until it is received; and, at the risk of appearing to be playing with words, I would remark that you cannot 'send off' a notice of dishonour which does not exist. In my judgment it cannot in any event be so treated for the purpose of ascertaining its meaning and effect.

A statement in a notice posted on 30th December which on its true construction means that a bill has been dishonoured on or before that day does not in my judgment acquire a different meaning because as a matter of law the notice containing the statement is not 'given' until the following day. Being an incorrect statement that something happened on or before 30th December, it cannot be regarded as a correct statement of something that happened the following day. Putting it in another way, no notice of dishonour was in my judgment ever 'given' because no notice containing a true statement that the bill had been dishonoured was ever delivered or sent. The notice here never had the necessary characteristic of a notice of dishonour that it should correctly state, not that the bill would be dishonoured, but that it has been dishonoured, and so qua notice of dishonour was never given.

A consideration of the terms of r (12) of s 49 of the Act leads me to the same conclusion. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of that rule speak of the notice—I stress the definite article—being given or sent off. What is contemplated is a notice having the necessary characteristic of a notice of dishonour—namely, containing a statement that the bill has been dishonoured—being sent off, and not a notice which not having that characteristic, may or may not acquire that characteristic while in transit. Moreover a plain reading of r (5) of s 49 shows, as I think common sense requires, that the notice of dishonour must state that the bill has been dishonoured, and since you cannot state that something has happened until it has happened, it follows, in my judgment, as the night follows the day, that a notice given before dishonour is not and never can be a notice of dishonour.

Any other view of the matter would in my judgment lead to great confusion. If while denying validity as a notice of dishonour to a notice posted on the second day of grace stating truthfully that the bill would be dishonoured on presentation, the law upheld the validity of one posted at the same moment stating untruthfully that the bill had been dishonoured, it would be at least anomalous. If it did so by attributing to the language of the notice an ambulatory effect operating on the state of affairs existing at the date the notice was received, it would introduce legal subtlety where all ought to be clear and would put a gloss on rules which codified the law as long ago as 1882 and have become well known to those dealing with bills of exchange. In general the meaning and effect of a document does not change while it is in the hands of the postman. If by applying to the construction and effect of a notice of dishonour the doctrine that the notice is not given until it is received and so treating it as having an ambulatory effect speaking not from the time the writer spoke but by reference to a changed state of affairs subsisting at the date of its receipt there would be introduced into this particular branch of the law a peculiarity not, so far as I can recollect, to be found in any other of its branches.

In the present case the defendants are without merit because they knew the bill would not be met; but the confusion which would result from upholding the plaintiffs' submission may be illustrated by supposing that the defendants had not had a that knowledge. They would have known when they opened the first post on the morning of 31st December that it could not be true, as represented in the notice, that the bill had been dishonoured prior to that day; but if the submission of the plaintiffs that technically the notice speaks from the time of its receipt is well founded, the defendants would, until they made some enquiry, be in ignorance of whether the bill had been dishonoured on 31st December. Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than a situation in which the recipient of a notice of dishonour is left in uncertainty b whether the bill has or has not been dishonoured and must make enquiry to ascertain the fact; a situation in which, contrary to principle, it would be impossible to say of the notice that it was couched in such terms that the recipient knew that the bill had been dishonoured. The difference of substance between such a case and the present case I think derives from the fact that here the recipient was certain that the bill would be dishonoured. But just as the knowledge of the recipient does not c excuse the sending of a notice of dishonour so that knowledge cannot in my judgment convert into a notice of dishonour complying with s 49 one which was otherwise not such a notice and did not so comply.

d It was submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs that any defect in the notice here in question does not matter because the defendants were not deceived; but this appears to me dangerously like an argument that because a party has notice of the true facts, a notice of dishonour can be altogether dispensed with. I accept counsel for the defendants' submission that the plaintiffs are inviting the court to introduce a new dispensation from the necessity of giving a proper notice of dishonour.

e The point was also made that since the notice bore the date 1st January the defendants must have known that it was intended to come into operation on that day. So regarded the notice, so it appears to me, is no more than a notice that the bill will have been dishonoured by 1st January and does not contain the necessary statement that the bill has been dishonoured.

f If I am wrong in the view I have expressed that a notice sent off before dishonour is not a valid notice of dishonour although received after dishonour, I share the view of Sachs LJ that this notice ought, for the reasons which he gives, to be taken to have been received before the bill was in fact dishonoured.

I too would allow the appeal.

Practice – Stay of proceedings – Jurisdiction – Medical examination of plaintiff – Plaintiff's refusal to submit to psychiatric examination – Amendment of statement of claim substantially enlarging gravity of neurosis aspect of case as originally pleaded – Delay – Plaintiff's refusal unreasonable.

In May 1968 the plaintiff was injured in a motor accident allegedly caused by the defendant's negligent driving. In September 1968 the plaintiff's solicitor sent to the defendant's solicitor a medical report which, although dealing in the main with orthopaedic matters, made it quite plain that a considerable neurosis element was subsisting. There followed, in December, a letter which made it plain to the defendant's solicitors that the neurosis element was serious. Following negotiations the writ was issued in January 1969. In April the plaintiff was examined by a neurologist on behalf of the defendant. In June the statement of claim was served in which the particulars of the injuries were stated shortly as: 'Bruising of chest. Contusion of left knee. Nervous shock, depressive anxiety state.' The defence was not served until May 1970 due to a series of negotiations with a view to a settlement. In February 1971 an order was made to carry on the action, the original defendant having died, and there was also an order to amend the pleadings. The amended statement of claim which was served in February 1971 considerably expanded the allegations contained in the original statement of claim, and enlarged the gravity of the neurosis aspect of the case. The defendant's solicitors had for some 12 months been pressing the neurologist who had examined the plaintiff in April 1969 to make a further examination of the plaintiff but they heard nothing until, following two further examinations, they received reports in May and July 1971. Neither the plaintiff nor the court had seen these reports. On 22nd July 1971 the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors asking that the plaintiff should submit to a further medical examination by a well-known consultant psychiatrist. This was refused, the plaintiff objecting not to the personality of the psychiatrist but on principle to a further examination by anyone. The defendant therefore applied to the master to have the action stayed unless the plaintiff submitted himself to a medical examination by the psychiatrist. The master refused the application. The defendant appealed to the judge who also refused to stay the proceedings. On appeal,

Held – An order for a medical examination of any party to an action was an invasion of personal liberty and should only be granted when it was reasonable in the interests of justice so to order; when the refusal of an examination was alleged to be unreasonable the onus lay on the party who said that it was unreasonable and who had applied for the order to show that he was unable properly to prepare his claim (or defence) without the examination. Although there had been considerable delay in the present case the action should be stayed unless the plaintiff submitted himself to a psychiatric examination because, in view of the substantial difference between the injuries as originally pleaded and the injuries pleaded in the amended statement of claim it was reasonable for the defendant to ask for the psychiatric examination in addition to the neurological examination which had originally been obtained; accordingly, and in view of the undertaking by the defendant to send the plaintiff's solicitors copies of the psychiatrist's report as soon as it was available as well as copies of the reports

It is difficult to see why it should be wrong in principle to stay an action under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 where the plaintiff refuses to undergo a medical examination. If there is evidence before the court obtained by a defendant to show that a widow's expectation of life is likely to be seriously diminished there may well be a case for staying the action unless she submits to a medical examination (see p 435 a and b and p 438 g and h, post).

Interlocutory appeal

- f This was an appeal by the defendant, John Metson Beach, executor of the estate of George William Willis, deceased, the original defendant, against an order of Talbot J made on 6th October 1971 in chambers dismissing his appeal against the decision of Master Lubbock made on 3rd September 1971 whereby the master refused to order that all proceedings in the action be stayed unless the plaintiff, Norman Alexander Lane, submitted himself to medical examination by Dr Denis Leigh, a consultant psychiatrist. In his action the plaintiff claimed damages for personal injuries and consequential loss to his motor car caused by the alleged negligent driving of the original defendant on 16th May 1968. The facts are set out in the judgment of
- g Davies LJ.

M J Turner for the defendant.

Henry Brooke for the plaintiff.

- h DAVIES LJ. This is an appeal, by leave of the judge, from an order of Talbot J made on 6th October 1971. He had before him an appeal by the defendant from an order of Master Lubbock made on 3rd September 1971. The master had had before him an application by the defendant for a stay of proceedings in default of the plaintiff submitting himself to medical examination by Dr Leigh, an extremely well-known psychiatrist. The master refused to make the order, and that refusal
- i was upheld by the learned judge. From that refusal, as I have said, the defendant appeals.

The history of the matter is as follows. On 16th May 1968 the plaintiff, who was a man aged 55, suffered injuries in an accident. On 13th September 1968 the plaintiff's solicitors sent to the defendant's solicitors a medical report by a surgeon, Mr Moynihan, dated 12th August 1968. Apparently for a time negotiations took place.

On 3rd January 1969 the writ was issued, and on 16th June 1969 the statement of claim was served. The defence was served in May 1970. Apparently that delay was explained by a series of negotiations with a view to settlement. Nothing further happened until, in February 1971, there was an order to carry on the action, the original defendant having died; and there was an order for leave to amend the pleadings. With regard to medical evidence, the order of the master provided for a medical report to be agreed if possible; if not, that the medical evidence be limited to three witnesses for each party.

The amended statement of claim was served on 8th February 1971. I think it is right that at this stage I should turn to the particulars of injuries both in the original and in the amended statement of claim. The injuries set out in the original statement of claim were stated very shortly. Paragraph 2 reads as follows:

‘By reason of the matters aforesaid, the Plaintiff suffered pain, injury, loss and damage which are continuing. Particulars of injuries: Bruising of chest. Contusion of left knee. Nervous shock, depressive anxiety state.’

That is the lot. By amendment, it reads (and I will read it incorporating the original):

‘Bruising of chest. Contusion of left knee, stirring up pre-existing minor degenerative changes in left knee joint and causing swelling and pain. Nervous shock, depressive anxiety state. The Plaintiff, who was aged 55 years at the date of the accident, was detained overnight in hospital for observation, and subsequently attended Holloway Sanatorium for 1 week in December 1968 for E.C.T. treatment for severe depression. He has suffered sleeplessness, nightmares, frequent bouts of depression lasting 1-2 hours, lost weight through losing his appetite. He previously enjoyed driving, which is essential for his work. As a result of the accident he is tense, irritable, and on edge when driving and feels exhausted after short drives. He may well have to retire prematurely from his employment instead of continuing until the age of 65, which would cause him substantial loss of earnings and of pensions payments. He has further sustained a recurrence of backache caused by a pre-existing prolapsed intervertebral disc dormant for some years which was exacerbated by the accident.’

So it can be seen that, although some of those extra matters are undoubtedly referred to in Mr Moynihan’s report of August 1968, nevertheless the allegations contained in the statement of claim are very considerably expanded by the amendment. The defence was amended on 1st March 1971.

I now turn to the question of the medical examination. On 19th April 1969 Dr Carroll, a neurologist, examined the plaintiff on behalf of the defendant. In February 1970, though nothing much turns on this, a Mr Shires, who is an orthopaedic surgeon, examined him with regard to his knee injuries. Then after the amendment made in 1971 the same Dr Carroll had two examinations of the plaintiff, on 14th May and 9th July. Apparently the defendant’s solicitors had been pressing Dr Carroll for some 12 months to make a further examination but, for some reason we do not know, they did not receive any reports from Dr Carroll until, as I have said, May and July 1971. On 22nd July 1971 the defendant’s solicitors (or the defendant’s insurance company, it does not matter which) asked the plaintiff’s solicitors that the plaintiff should submit to medical examination by the well-known psychiatrist, Dr Leigh, to whom I have already referred. That was refused on 5th August; hence this application.

We have a short note of the judgment of Talbot J, and I refer only to two passages in it. He mentions certain authorities, to which I shall have to turn shortly, and he goes on:

‘I think the Court should approach with considerable care, bearing in mind

a that it is being asked as stated by Donovan LJ in *Pickett v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd*¹ "although this Court has inherent jurisdiction to do what is here asked, I am clear that the power should not be exercised in this case. Indeed, for myself I would go the whole length of saying that it would be wrong in this class of action to make an order which in effect shuts out the Plaintiff from the seat of justice, even if he refused all medical examination on behalf of the Defendants, and still less if, as in this case, he merely objects to the particular doctor they choose. The sanction, if any, lies elsewhere".

b I would interpolate there that for myself I find it difficult, as did Widgery LJ in the subsequent case of *Edmeades v Thames Board Mills Ltd*², to see what other sanction could be available. To continue with the judgment of Talbot J, his final conclusion is in these terms:

c 'In those circumstances was the refusal of the request unreasonable? If the examination does not take place, is the proper issue going to be prevented from being determined?'

And the judge answers that question 'No'.

d The whole question, as I think, in the present case is: in the circumstances, was the defendant's request for a further psychiatric examination reasonable? or was the plaintiff's refusal to submit himself to it reasonable?

e I am bound to say that, although I think the defendant has been guilty of some dilatoriness and although, as has been emphasised in the course of the argument by Sachs LJ, there was not put before the master or the judge, or this court, any expert or medical evidence to show that such an examination is desirable, and indeed necessary, for the defendant properly to conduct his defence to this claim, I think that on all the history of this case it is a reasonable request and ought to be granted.

f We have been referred to a number of authorities in this case, and it is necessary that I should deal with them to some extent. The first case to which I would refer is an unreported case, *Pickett v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd*¹, in which Donovan LJ delivered the judgment from which the learned judge quoted. That case was decided in 1961, and it was a decision of this court composed of Willmer and Donovan LJ. I do not propose to quote any more than did the learned judge in the note of his judgment which I have just read. But I would point out two things which are inherent in what Donovan LJ said: one, that the court expressed no doubt at all that there was jurisdiction to make such an order, and secondly, that the real ground on which the court acted there was that the defendants were insisting on an examination by one particular doctor to whom the plaintiff objected. That was the basis of their refusal to make the order. It is perfectly true that in the instant case it is only one particular doctor, i.e. Dr Leigh, that the defendant is suggesting should examine the plaintiff. But counsel for the plaintiff in this court has said in terms that it is not the personality of the doctor, Dr Leigh, to which objection is taken: objection is taken on principle that there should be no further medical examination by anyone. So much for *Pickett v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd*¹.

g I turn now to the decision of this court in *Edmeades v Thames Board Mills Ltd*². It is a well-known case. The court on that occasion was composed of Lord Denning MR, Widgery LJ and myself. I think I need cite from that case one passage only. I should just preface my quotation from it by saying that in that case the defendants were wanting a further examination by any one of six doctors and the plaintiff rejected them all. In the original pleading the plaintiff's injuries were stated to be³:

'Abrasions of the left shin; swelling of the left foot, ankle and thigh; and partial rupture of the quadriceps muscle; and it was claimed that the injuries had caused him to give up gardening, which had put him to further expense.'

1 (16th March 1961) unreported

3 [1969] 2 QB at 68

2 [1969] 2 All ER 127, [1969] 2 QB 67

But subsequently it became clear from an examination of him by a doctor on his own behalf that he was suffering from⁴ 'a small marginal fracture of the left patella'—mentioned for the first time—and the doctor 'added that if that were so there had been "a substantial aggravation of the long-standing osteo-arthritis"'. So that there was there a considerable difference between the injuries as originally alleged and the injuries for the inclusion of which it would appear an amendment would be asked when the case got to court. A similar application was made there by the defendants for a stay of the action in default of the plaintiff submitting himself to examination.

I now turn to the judgment of Lord Denning MR. He prefaced the observation I am about to read with a reference to the committee⁵ presided over by Winn LJ, who, with regard to this sort of situation, had said:

'In case of need, we consider that the Court must have a power if necessary by legislation to stay the action pending the plaintiff submitting to such an examination.'

Lord Denning MR continued⁶:

'I do not think legislation is necessary. This court has ample jurisdiction to grant a stay whenever it is just and reasonable so to do. It can, therefore, order a stay if the conduct of the plaintiff in refusing a reasonable request is such as to prevent the just determination of the cause. The question in this case is simply whether the request was reasonable or not.'

I think that is the test, and it is a test that has been applied once or twice since the case was decided. But there has been a subsequent decision of Lawson J in *Baugh v Delta Water Fittings Ltd*⁷. I ought to say at once that I find the facts of that case quite different from the present case and the other cases to which I have referred. For that was an action under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 and the defendants had asked for a similar order for a stay of the action in default of the plaintiff widow submitting herself to medical examination. There was a complete absence of evidence that there was anything wrong with the widow, anything to enquire into; and I should have thought that that might have been a very proper ground for the learned judge refusing to make the order applied for. But he went a great deal further and said (I will make a quotation in a moment) that in principle such an order ought not to be made. His observations as I read them were not confined to an action under the Fatal Accidents Acts but were directed to all actions for damages for personal injuries. He said this⁸, under the heading 'The question of principle':

'In my judgment it is wrong in principle to stay an action under the Fatal Accidents Acts unless and until a widow or other dependant in respect of whom a claim for loss of dependency is included submits to a medical examination. In reaching this conclusion I start with the proposition that a requirement under compulsion to submit to a medical examination or medical tests is an invasion of personal liberty which can only be justified where Parliament has imposed or authorised the imposition of such a requirement and, as a rule, has provided an appropriate sanction for non-compliance.'

Then he referred to *S v S, W v Official Solicitor*⁹. The learned judge omits to mention that in that case, which was a case in the House of Lords, Lord MacDermott, who was sitting as a member of the House, expressly referred to the case of *Edmeades*¹⁰ and a made no suggestion that it was otherwise than rightly decided. Whether Lawson J was right in saying that it would be wrong in any case to order a widow to be examined, I doubt. If there was before the court some evidence obtained by the defendants to show that her expectation of life, owing to some disease or other cause, was likely to be seriously diminished, then I should have thought that that might well be a case for ordering her to submit to medical examination, or rather to stay the action unless she did so submit. But we need not concern ourselves with that, as that is not this case.

b Now I turn to read a passage in Lawson J's judgment where he dealt with the case of *Edmeades*¹¹. Having dealt with the case of *Pickett*¹², which I have already attempted to explain, he went on in this way¹³:

c 'The position as indicated by that decision of the Court of Appeal in 1961 [i.e. *Pickett*¹²] seems, however, to have been radically affected so far as injured plaintiffs are concerned by a later decision of the Court of Appeal in *Edmeades v Thames Board Mills Ltd*¹¹.'

Then he summarised the judgment of Lord Denning MR in that case and continued in these terms¹⁴:

d 'With the greatest possible respect I do not find palatable the use of the court's jurisdiction to stay proceedings and thus achieve a result indirectly, which could not be achieved by a direct order. I question whether the employment of the inherent jurisdiction of the court in this way conduces to respect for the administration of justice. Nevertheless I am bound by the decision in Edmeades case¹¹, although I am compelled to say, again with the greatest respect, that I believe it to have been wrongly decided.'

e With the greatest respect to the learned judge, I think that those observations were out of place. It is unusual and, I am bound to say, undesirable, in my opinion, for a judge sitting at first instance—indeed, in that case in chambers—to express the opinion, although accepting that he is bound by it, that a decision, and a fairly recent decision, of this court was wrong. I for myself adhere firmly to the opinion which this court expressed in Edmeades's case¹¹, namely, that, in an appropriate case, given the right circumstances, this court has the jurisdiction to make that order.

f There remains very little for me to say. There has obviously been a considerable delay on the part of the defendant in this case. Whether it was due to his insurance company, or to the solicitors, or to the doctor, I do not know. Possibly it would have been better if, instead of, as people are apt to do in these actions, keeping their cards close to their chest, as the saying is, they had exchanged their reports with a view to seeing whether they could be agreed. That is true. But it does seem to me, in view of the substantial difference between the injuries as originally pleaded and the injuries as pleaded in February 1971, that it is reasonable for the defendant to ask for a psychiatric examination as well as the neurological examination which had originally been had by them.

h I for myself would allow the appeal.

SACHS LJ. The principles on which a court should, in aid of obtaining a medical examination of one of the parties to an action, act when deciding whether or not to take the somewhat strong course of staying the action if a medical examination is not afforded, are by now clear. An order for a medical examination of any party to an action has been well said to be an 'invasion of personal liberty'. Accordingly, it should

i 11 [1969] 2 All ER 127, [1969] 2 QB 67

12 (16th March 1961) unreported

13 [1971] 3 All ER at 262, [1971] 1 WLR at 1300

only be granted when it is reasonable in the interests of justice so to order. When the refusal of a medical examination is alleged to be unreasonable, the onus lies on the party who says that it is unreasonable and who applies for the order to show, on the particular facts of the case, that he is unable properly to prepare his claim (or defence) without that examination. The onus lies firmly on the applicant, as counsel for the defendant very rightly conceded. Let me say at once as regards the judgment of Lawson J¹⁵, to which Davies LJ has referred in terms with which I am in full agreement, that if there is anything in it which suggests these orders should not be made even when the onus has been discharged, it should, of course, not be followed.

Turning now to the facts of the instant case, it is one in which the statement of claim was amended pursuant to an order of 2nd February 1971. Much was made, in the course of argument by counsel for the defendant, of this amendment, which undoubtedly on the face of it enlarges the gravity of the neurosis aspect of the case. It should, however, be recorded that as early as 13th September 1968, the plaintiff's solicitors sent to the defendant's solicitors a report which, albeit dealing in the main with the orthopaedic matters, yet made it quite plain that a considerable neurosis element was subsisting. Moreover, on 17th December 1968 there followed a letter in which again it was made plain that the neurosis element not merely subsisted but was serious. It is to be observed that the letter of 17th December adds:

'We are informing you of this as, with respect, it may be more appropriate for your examination to be by a specialist in matters involving nervous shock. At the present time, [the plaintiff], is undergoing a course of treatment for this nervous shock and the consequent symptoms.'

In many ways the amendment of 2nd February 1971 had been foreshadowed by material which was in the hands of the defendant's solicitors.

It is as well to state here and now that throughout the course of these proceedings the conduct of the plaintiff's solicitors has been impeccable in providing such information as it was proper to give the defendant and in helping the defendant to obtain such medical examinations as were appropriate to the case.

This is a serious neurosis case and it is right to emphasise that in such a case each successive examination of the unfortunate plaintiff must be apt to disturb him and to aggravate the very thing for which he is claiming compensation. To that extent a plaintiff in his position requires the aid—as was indeed given to him by his solicitors—of every effort to protect him against unnecessary examinations. Until the end of July 1971 there was really no suggestion made on behalf of the defendant that an examination by someone other than Dr Carroll was necessary. Since the 2nd February 1971 order for the amendment of the statement of claim, there have already been two examinations by Dr Carroll, but we have seen nothing of that doctor's reports; nor has the plaintiff. In those circumstances I confess that it was with some reluctance that I have been led to the view that the plaintiff should be compelled to have yet another examination. That reluctance is increased by the way the matter has been handled on behalf of the defendant—and in saying that I wish to make it plain that no blame attaches in that behalf to counsel for the defendant.

The defendant's solicitors were by the first week in February aware of the amendment of the statement of claim and in the same month they had had advice from counsel to consider whether there should, having regard to that amendment, be a further examination by Dr Carroll or whether there should be an examination by a psychiatrist if Dr Carroll so advised. In fact the plaintiff was examined by Dr Carroll not once but twice—in May and in July; and so ineffective, apparently, were the steps taken on behalf of the defendant in relation to medical examinations that it was not until 22nd July that his solicitors wrote a letter, in the baldest possible terms. This letter in effect read, we have been told, as follows: 'We would be grateful if you would afford facilities for an examination by Dr. Leigh.' Not a word as to why

15 I.e. in Baugh v Delta Water Fittings Ltd [1971] 3 All ER 258, [1971] 1 WLR 1295

- a it was regarded as necessary at this stage or as to why this plaintiff should be further disturbed.

When the matter came before the master and the judge in chambers, it is manifest that in those circumstances the onus lay heavily on the defendant to show that such a further examination was needed. But he produced nothing in the way of medical evidence to show why another doctor or expert was required. He did nothing but produce correspondence.

- b For my part, I am by no means prepared to say that either the master or the learned judge was wrong on the material laid before them. Now, however, we have had further discussion of the case, the fact that some medical evidence should have been put before the master or the judge—and preferably, to my mind, the reports of Dr Carroll—has been ventilated, and it has become plain that in future cases of this particular type (if these should ever recur) such medical evidence should be produced; no room should be left for a plaintiff to wonder whether the application is really due to the reports of a defendant's medical expert being favourable to the plaintiff. On the other hand, this particular case is the first occasion that there has been fully discussed what should be done and how the strong onus that lies on a person who seeks an extra medical examination in these particular circumstances should be discharged. I am thus prepared, as this is the first case of this particular type, to accept counsel for the defendant's statement at the Bar that this is a case in which, in the interests of justice, a psychiatrist should be available to the defence and that the preparation of the case for the defence requires an examination by that psychiatrist in advance of trial. Accordingly, for those reasons I am prepared to accept—albeit, as already stated, with reluctance—that an appropriate order to that end should be made.

- e There is only one further observation that needs to be made, and that is in support of what has been said by Davies LJ as regards the exchange of medical reports. There is far too much reluctance in this matter of exchanging—far too much manoeuvring behind the scenes—far too much (especially on the part of defendants) trying to hold back a report until the moment of trial. The object of making orders in the form in which they are made on a summons for directions is to ensure that reports be exchanged, unless there is some really good reason to the contrary. In this case I am glad that counsel for the defendant has felt himself able to give a firm undertaking to the court that the moment Dr Leigh's report is received he will send to the plaintiff's solicitors both that report and all the reports of Dr Carroll—receiving, of course, in exchange any outstanding reports which were made as a result of medical examinations on behalf of the plaintiff.

- g ROSKILL LJ. I agree that this appeal should be allowed. I add a few words for two reasons only: first because we are differing from Talbot J, and secondly, because I desire to express my concurrence with everything which has fallen from Davies LJ, with reference to the decision of Lawson J in *Baugh v Delta Water Fittings Ltd*¹⁶.

- h So far as Talbot J's decision in the present case is concerned, the learned judge at the end of his judgment (of which we have a very complete note taken by counsel) rightly posed the question thus:

'In those circumstances was the refusal of the request unreasonable? If the examination does not take place, is the proper issue going to be prevented from being determined?'

- j The learned judge answered that question in the negative, as had the master from whom the appeal was brought to Talbot J.

I confess that if I had been sitting as judge in chambers and had had to deal with this issue on the same material as did Talbot J, I should have reached the same conclusion as he did. But the matter has pursued a somewhat different course in this court. Before Talbot J the defendant, on whom the onus entirely rested, did not vouchsafe any evidence in support of the application that the plaintiff's action should be stayed unless he submitted to an examination by Dr Denis Leigh, the well-known consultant psychiatrist. There was no medical evidence placed before the learned judge; there was no affidavit from the defendant's solicitors saying that they had been advised that such evidence was essential to the proper conduct of the defendant's case. The learned judge was, therefore, left to deal with the matter almost, as it were, in vacuo. But, as Sachs LJ pointed out, in this court counsel for the defendant has—in my judgment very properly—undertaken that if this court makes the order which he seeks, at any rate in some form, the defendant's solicitors will, as soon as they get Dr Leigh's report, send to the plaintiff's solicitors a copy not only of that report but of the various reports which Dr Carroll has already made as a result of his several examinations of the plaintiff. If the defendant does not wish to call Dr Carroll at the trial, it would then be open to the plaintiff to call him if he so desired. It is for those reasons that I reach a different conclusion from Talbot J and the learned master and think that the order sought should be made.

So far as the decision of Lawson J in *Baugh v Delta Water Fittings Ltd*¹⁷ is concerned, I would respectfully emphasise what Davies LJ has said, that the decision in *Edmeades v Thames Board Mills Ltd*¹⁸ was expressly approved by Lord MacDermott in *S v S, W v Official Solicitor*¹⁹. Lord MacDermott said¹⁹:

'The rule book naturally tends to lag behind new methods of proof and ascertainment, and the essential purpose of this ancillary jurisdiction means that it cannot be tied to what is old or outmoded. For example, the increasing number of claims which put in issue the bodily condition of a party have in recent years produced what is now a very common demand by defendants, namely that the claimant shall submit to a medical examination. There is nothing about this in the rules of court; but the jurisdiction of the High Court to order such an examination cannot, in my view, be questioned in this day and age. See, for a recent example, *Edmeades v Thames Board Mills Ltd*¹⁸, where the Court of Appeal ordered a stay until the plaintiff, seeking damages for personal injuries, submitted himself to a medical examination.'

Lord MacDermott then quotes the crucial passage from the judgment of Lord Denning MR in Edmeades's case²⁰. Lawson J referred to *S v S*¹ in his judgment, but he appears to have overlooked that passage in Lord MacDermott's speech. I am afraid I am quite unable to accept the learned judge's view that Edmeades's case¹⁸ was wrongly decided. Nor indeed was it a matter for him whether it was rightly decided or not. The present case is not a case of a claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959. But I respectfully agree with what has fallen from Davies LJ that it is difficult to see why it is wrong in principle to stay an action under the Fatal Accidents Acts in the appropriate case if there is power—as in my judgment there clearly is—to stay an action where the injured party has survived, if he unreasonably refuses to submit to a medical examination. Obviously the power to stay would be used less frequently in the case of a claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts; but that it exists and can be employed in a suitable case admits, in my judgment, of no doubt.

For those reasons I agree that this appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed.

a Thorne Rural District Council v Bunting

CHANCERY DIVISION

MEGARRY J

6th, 7th OCTOBER 1971

- b Declaration – Jurisdiction – Locus standi of applicant – Sufficiency of interest to support claim – Commons registration – Registration of claims in respect of properties within area of rural district – Application by rural district council for declarations that claimant had no such rights – Council having no proprietary rights in properties concerned – Indirect financial interest by reason of effect on rateable values – Existence of rights affecting council's powers under planning legislation – Whether council having locus standi as plaintiff.
- c The defendant, who owned a house in a rural district in Yorkshire, had registered extensive claims under the Commons Registration Act 1965 in respect of properties within the area of the rural district. The rural district council, who owned only one of the properties concerned, a road, brought an action asking for declarations that the defendant had no such rights. The main complaint of the council was that the defendant's claims had discouraged prospective developers from developing land in the rural district. On the question whether the council had any locus standi as a plaintiff before the court, except as to the road, the council contended that it had sufficient interest to support its claim to the declarations sought in that (i) it was concerned financially insofar as the rateable value of properties in its area might well be affected by the existence of the rights of common claimed, (ii) it was affected in relation to its powers under the planning legislation, and (iii) under the 1965
- d Act no limitation was placed on the persons who might lodge objections to any claim to rights of common.

Held – Even if the council was indirectly concerned with the existence or otherwise of the rights of common and the matter was one of consequential interest to the council, this indirect concern did not amount to such a substantial interest as to justify the council in making a claim for a declaration relating to land in which it had no proprietary interest; what the council was seeking was not in any real sense of the word 'relief', i.e. something that would relieve the council from any real liability or disadvantage or difficulty; accordingly the council had no locus standi to sue for the declarations sought, save in respect of the road (see p 443 f and g, post).

Preliminary point of law

This was a preliminary point of law for determination by the court whether the Thorne Rural District Council had any locus standi as a plaintiff in an action it had brought against William Bunting, the defendant, asking for declarations that the defendant had no right to claims he had registered under the Commons Registration Act 1965. The facts are set out in the judgment. a Jeremiah Harman QC and Ian McCulloch for the plaintiff council.

A J Balcombe QC and J R MacDonald for the defendant.

MEGARRY J. I have before me an action and a motion by the plaintiff council. In the action, a preliminary point of law has arisen. The plaintiff council is a rural district council in Yorkshire. The defendant is a resident in the rural district in which he owns a house which has an area of somewhat less than 200 square yards. Originally there were three defendants, but the other two have now disappeared from the proceedings. The area of the rural district, I may say, substantially coincides with the ancient manor of Hatfield. b

The defendant has registered various claims under the Commons Registration Act 1965 in respect of the whole area of the rural district. The claims are for a variety of rights of piscary, venary and aucupary, and a variety of profits in the soil, together with a profit of pasture for 1,000 cattle. The plaintiff council claims four declarations that the defendant has no such rights, and four injunctions, one of them restraining the defendant from exercising such rights, and three of them for mandatory orders requiring the defendant to remove or amend or procure the removal or amendment of various registrations that he has effected under the Act. By the motion the plaintiff council seeks the four injunctions. I may say that the claim to the rights apparently depends on such matters as an agreement between Charles I and one Cornelius Vermuyden in 1626, a contract of 1628, a decree and award of the Court of Exchequer in 1630, an Enclosure Act of 1811, and an Enclosure Award of 1825, as well as immemorial user. Doubtless there is much interesting historical matter to be explored. Many objections have been made to the registration of these various common rights, amounting, I understand, to nearly 900, and I have been told that considerable local feeling has been aroused. A main complaint of the plaintiff council is that the defendant's claims have discouraged prospective developers from developing any land in the rural district. c

The genesis of the preliminary point now before me is as follows. At the end of last week, with the motion facing him, the defendant requested the county council to cancel the registration for roughly half of the land in question. I understand that his applications for cancellation are not all complete, but that those remaining are in the course of being made. Under s 5 (5) of the Act, the county council as the registration authority under the Act has a discretionary power on such an application to cancel or modify the registration. I shall refer to the area in respect of which, on the assumption that all the applications for cancellation are granted, there remains any live application for registration by the defendant as the 'blue land', from the hatching on a plan with which I have been supplied. The blue land excludes nearly all the land in the rural district which is owned by the plaintiff council, and nearly all the land in the rural district in respect of which there are present prospects of development. The blue land also excludes a large number of small islands of land on which stand residences owned by others. The blue land still includes, however, a road owned by the plaintiff council called Broadbent Gate Moor Road, which I shall refer to simply as 'the road'. d

With these qualifications, the plaintiff council has now achieved the major part of its objective, in that, subject to the county council cancelling the registrations, the discouraging effect of registration has been removed from nearly all the land with prospects of development, as well as from nearly all the plaintiff council's own land. Furthermore, the reduction of the defendant's area of claim to the blue land will meet the objections in all the 900 or so cases, save some 19; and of these 19 objections, I understand that five are by the registration authority, the county council. e a In view of this substantial change, the question that arises is what course this action should now take.

Yesterday, at the opening of the case, there was some argument on the relationship of these proceedings to the 1965 Act. This Act provides special machinery for the working out of claims to commons by commons commissioners who are to be appointed, with an appeal on points of law to the High Court by way of case stated.

b The bulk of the Act came into force at the beginning of 1967, and the provisions as to the commons commissioners and appeals to the High Court on 1st January 1970. Unfortunately, even though a year and three-quarters has elapsed since these provisions came into force, no commons commissioners have yet been appointed, and the Act is accordingly still not in full operation. In *Booker v James*¹ Pennycuik J had to deal with the position before 1970, and, by a narrow margin, in *Trafford v Ashby*² I had to do the same. In each case it was held that the court still retained its jurisdiction during the interim period. In *Booker v James*³ Pennycuik J said:

d 'On the face of the Act the jurisdiction to determine the issue whether or not a particular piece of land is a common is entrusted to Commons Commissioners. It is plainly the intention of the Act to exclude the jurisdiction of the court, at any rate, in any ordinary case. The question may arise in future whether the court possesses some residual jurisdiction; for instance, to deal with cases where the registration, on the face of it, represents an abuse of the right of registration conferred by the Act.'

To that statement I ventured to lodge a caveat, saying in *Trafford v Ashby*⁴:

e '...it seems quite plain that the Act of 1965 has provided appropriate machinery for settling disputes. It may well be that this is intended to be the normal procedure. The remedy by making a declaration is, like that of an injunction, a discretionary remedy, and so the courts may often reach the conclusion that a matter would be more appropriately dealt with under the special machinery of the Act than by the general remedy of making a declaration and granting an injunction. Be that as it may, I cannot, for my part, at present see what there is in the Act of 1965 which so plainly excludes the jurisdiction of the courts that the remedy by way of declaration and injunction is taken away. The matter, in other words, seems to me to be one not of jurisdiction but of discretion. However, the matter has not been fully argued out in contested proceedings, and I wish to make it plain that I am doing no more than I professed to do at the outset, namely, lodge a caveat.'

g Whichever of these views is right, there seem to be obvious advantages in leaving all ordinary cases of dispute to the special procedure under the Act, with the courts exercising jurisdiction only in cases where there would otherwise be some failure of justice. However, having regard to the fact that no commons commissioners have yet been appointed, I feel no doubt that even if (contrary to my provisional view) h the matter is one of jurisdiction and not merely of discretion, the court retains sufficient jurisdiction to deal with the point that I have to decide. For today, counsel on both sides turned to a preliminary point of law which, by common consent, they wished to have argued and decided first; and in the event I did not think it right to refuse their request.

j The point of law, as stated under RSC Ord 33, r 3, is in substance whether or not, in the events which have happened, the plaintiff council has any locus standi as a plaintiff before this court, save and except as to the road. On this, I have heard considerable argument, and I have had cited to me *Dyson v A-G*⁵, *Guaranty Trust Co of New York v Hannay & Co*⁶, *Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission*⁷, and a number of passages from a textbook and the notes in the Supreme Court Practice to RSC Ord 15, r 16. In addition, during the argument yesterday, counsel for the defendant cited certain authorities to show that on the facts of this case the plaintiff council had no cause of action. Today, however, on the authorities that I have mentioned he accepted the contention that in proceedings for a declaration it is not necessary to show that there is a cause of action in the ordinary sense of the word. He contended, however, that this did not mean that anybody could sue for a declaration, however, little real connection he might have with the subject-matter of dispute; the plaintiff, he said, must have a substantial interest recognised by the law. In the Dyson case⁵, of course, the bone of contention was a form which had to be completed under threat of a penalty, while in the Anisminic case⁷ it was the disallowance of a claim to compensation.

Now in this case, counsel for the plaintiff council has pointed out the various matters which, he says, constitute a sufficient interest for the plaintiff council to support its claim to the declarations sought. First, he said that the plaintiff council was concerned in a financial way, in that the rateable value of properties in its area might well be affected by the existence or non-existence of the various claims to rights of common. Second, he pointed to the plaintiff council's delegated powers under the planning legislation, and said that the council was affected in that sense in a very real way. Third, he pointed to the 1965 Act, and said (as was accepted by counsel for the defendant) that there was no limitation placed by the Act on the persons who might lodge objections to any claim to rights of common. He subsumed these three claims under the general head of an interest in the rural district and in its good government, a head which is plainly capable of comprising other matters than the three specific heads that he put forward, though no doubt those were the most important.

It seems to me that these are somewhat shadowy interests to support the claim made for the declarations; and it was not suggested that the claims for injunctions could be in any better case. What is here in question is a series of declarations relating to the existence of rights of common over land owned by others. I leave on one side, of course, the road, which is owned by the plaintiff council. In the whole of the rest of the blue land it is accepted that the plaintiff council has no proprietary interest, and can rely only on those interests put forward on its behalf by counsel.

I accept that the remedy by way of declaration is wide and flexible, and that in recent years the tendency of the courts towards width and flexibility has, if anything, been accentuated; the remedy is indeed a valuable servant. But there must be some limit. For myself, I am at a loss to see why a local authority should be entitled to litigate a claim by A to rights of common over B's land by suing A for a declaration when B, who is the person most closely affected, is not even a party to the proceedings. If the local authority loses, why should B have his land incumbered by the consequent strengthening or apparent strengthening of an adverse claim over it which he might well have been able to defeat had he taken part in the proceedings? If the local authority wins, why should B have any consequent improvement of the value of his land effected at the ratepayers' expense? Why should A be vexed by litigation over his claim if B, the landowner, has no intention of resisting it, just because the local authority decides that it wishes to litigate the point? Further, even if the local authority is indirectly concerned with the existence or otherwise of the rights of common, and the matter is one of consequent financial interest to that authority, I a do not see that this indirect concern amounts to such a substantial interest as to justify the authority in making a claim for a declaration.

In *Guaranty Trust Co of New York v Hannay & Co*⁸, Pickford LJ discussed what is now RSC Ord 15, r 16, and said:

b 'I think therefore that the effect of the rule is to give a general power to make a declaration whether there be a cause of action or not, and at the instance of any party who is interested in the subject-matter of the declaration. It does not extend to enable any stranger to the transaction to go and ask the Court to express its opinion in order to help him in other transactions.'

Banks LJ said⁹, again speaking of the rule:

c 'It is essential, however, that a person who seeks to take advantage of the rule must be claiming relief. What is meant by this word relief? When once it is established, as I think it is established, that relief is not confined to relief in respect of a cause of action it seems to follow that the word itself must be given its fullest meaning. There is, however, one limitation which must always be attached to it, that is to say, the relief claimed must be something which it would not be unlawful or unconstitutional or inequitable for the Court to grant or contrary to the accepted principles upon which the Court exercises its jurisdiction. Subject to this limitation I see nothing to fetter the discretion of the Court in exercising a jurisdiction under the rule to grant relief, and having regard to general business convenience and the importance of adapting the machinery of the Courts to the needs of suitors I think the rule should receive d as liberal a construction as possible.'

Construing the rule as liberally as one may, it seems to me that what the plaintiff council is seeking in this case is not in any real sense of the word 'relief', that is, something which will relieve the council from any real liability or disadvantage or difficulty which affects the council. In my judgment, the council's complaint is too
f indirect and insubstantial to justify proceedings for a declaration relating to land in which they have no proprietary interest. I also bear in mind that the making of the declaration is a discretionary remedy; there may be other cases where on other facts there is a more substantial reason for a local authority to claim a declaration in respect of land in their area not owned by the authority. But accepting to the full for the purposes of this argument the points that have been put forward by counsel
g for the plaintiff council, it seems to me there are no sufficient grounds to support the claim for a declaration save in relation to the road. Accordingly, I answer the point of law that has been submitted for decision by holding that in the events which have occurred the plaintiff council has no locus standi to sue for the declarations sought save in respect of the road.

I should add this. Yesterday there was some considerable argument about the h ambit of s 276 of the Local Government Act 1933. I do not think I need go into that, except to say that on the facts of this case it does not seem to me to assist the plaintiff council.

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

RUSSELL, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJ

8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 22nd NOVEMBER 1971

Settlement – Class gift – Distribution date – Rule in Andrews v Partington – Time of ascertainment of class – Trust ‘for such of the children of the two sons of the Appointer . . . whenever born as . . . shall attain the age of twenty one’ etc – Eldest grandchild having reached age of 21 – Two sons still living – Whether words ‘whenever born’ excluding operation of rule.

Settlement – Class gift – Distribution date – Rule in Andrews v Partington – Settlement of land – Trust for sale – Power of trustees to postpone sale – Trust for children of settlor’s two sons ‘who shall attain the age of twenty one years’ etc – Eldest grandchild attaining age of 21 – Sons still living – Grandchild having no power to compel sale of land on attaining vested interest – Whether fact that at the time of the settlement the property settled was solely land excluding the operation of the rule.

The testator by his will gave his son, S, a power of appointment over one-quarter of his residuary estate. The power of appointment was limited to ‘all or such one or more exclusively of the . . . children or remoter issue . . . in such shares and in such manner in all respects as [S] shall by deed . . . appoint . . .’ In 1948 S executed a deed of appointment in pursuance of the power and, by cl 1 thereof, he directed the trustees to stand possessed of the appointed share ‘upon trust for such of the children of the two sons of [S] . . . whenever born as being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty one or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry as a single class and if more than one in equal shares’. By cl 3 it was provided that the powers of maintenance and advancement implied by the Trustee Act 1925 or any statute amending or replacing the same should apply to the appointed share. In 1949 S conveyed certain freehold and leasehold properties to trustees on trust to retain or sell, which by the Law of Property Act 1925 operated as an immediate binding trust for sale with power in the discretion of the trustees to postpone that sale. By a contemporaneous settlement the proceeds of sale were to be held on trust ‘for such of the children of the two sons of [S] . . . as being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty one years or being a daughter shall attain that age or marry as a single class and if more than one in equal shares’. In 1948, when S made the appointment, one of his sons had a daughter less than a year old while the other son had only recently married. At the time when the proceedings were brought each of the sons had four children, S therefore having a total of eight grandchildren, of whom three had attained the age of 21. One of S’s sons had married a second time, his wife being 30 years old. The question arose whether the rule in Andrews v Partington^a applied to the deed of appointment and to the settlement so that, the eldest grandchild having reached the age of 21, any further grandchildren born were excluded from the class of beneficiaries in each case. It was contended that the deed of appointment by its terms disclosed an intention to exclude the rule; further that the rule was also excluded in relation to the settlement on the grounds (i) that a beneficiary with a vested interest in the case of land settled on trust for sale had no right to demand sale and transfer of his share, (ii) that the function of the a rule was to enable a member of a class to claim as of right payment or transfer of his share on attaining a vested interest, and (iii) that therefore where at the time of the settlement the property consisted solely of land the rule had no operation.

Held – (i) The phrase ‘whenever born’ in cl 1 of the deed of appointment was a specific and emphatic phrase which in terms pointed to all time in the future. It was equivalent to ‘at whatever time they may be born’ and was limited only by the course of nature to the lifetime of the parents. Whereas the phrase ‘born or hereafter to be born’ was a general reference to the future without express limit in time and, therefore, consistent with a limit imposed by the direction for vesting and the rule, the phrase ‘whenever born’ was a particular reference to the future expressly unlimited in time and, therefore, readily to be distinguished as inconsistent with a time limitation such as that imposed by the rule. Accordingly, the rule was excluded by the deed of appointment and the class of beneficiaries embraced all children of the sons whether born before or after the attainment by the first of a vested interest (see p 449 f and g and p 450 b, post).

d (ii) The rule, however, applied to the settlement. The function of the rule was to enable trustees to distribute by removing uncertainty or, if it were to enable a beneficiary who had attained a vested interest to claim his minimum share, it was to enable the claim to be made but subject to the due and proper exercise by the trustees of the administrative powers and directions to which the whole trust and every share therein was subject. The proposition that the rule was not applicable where the only property settled was land was untenable. Accordingly there being no grounds for excluding the rule, the class of beneficiaries under the settlement had closed when the eldest grandchild of the settlor attained the age of 21 (see p 450 f and g, post); Re Canney's Trusts (1910) 101 LT 905 applied.

e Per Curiam. The provision in cl 3 of the deed of appointment that the powers of maintenance and advancement implied by the Trustee Act 1925 should apply to the appointed funds was not inconsistent with the applicability of the rule in Andrews v Partington^b (see p 448 h and j, post); Re Henderson's Trusts [1969] 3 All ER 769 distinguished.

Appeal

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, the Reverend the Rt Hon John Cyril second Baron Sandford of Banbury and the Hon Anthony James Kinghorn Edmondson, against decisions of Goulding J dated 11th and 12th March 1971 and reported [1971] 3 All ER 1121. The facts were as follows.

The testator, James Edmondson, made his will on 7th March 1931 and died on 7th June 1931. By cl 10 of the will he directed his trustees to hold one-fourth of his residuary estate on trust to pay the income thereof to his son, later to become the first Lord Sandford, during his life and after his death to hold the share on trust—

‘for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of my said son if more than one in such shares and in such manner in all respects as my said son shall by deed revocable or irrevocable or by Will or Codicil appoint . . .’

By a deed dated 25th July 1948 Lord Sandford exercised his power of appointment in pursuance of the power given to him by the testator. The deed recited that it was supplemental to the testator's will and continued:

‘THE Appointor is desirous of making such exercise of the power of appointment conferred on him by the Will of the Testator in favour of his two sons [the first and second plaintiffs] hereinafter mentioned (both of whom were born in the lifetime of the Testator) and of their children hereinafter set forth and of making such release as is hereinafter contained.’

The operative part of the deed was in the following terms:

‘1. IN pursuance of the power conferred on him in that behalf and of all if any the powers him thereto enabling THE Appointor DOTH HEREBY IRREVOCABLY APPOINT that the Trustees shall from the date hereof stand possessed of the one quarter or other the share of the Testator's residuary estate to the income of which the Appointor is or may become entitled during his life (hereinafter called “the Appointed Share”) upon trust for such of the children of the two sons of the Appointor namely the [first plaintiff] and the [second plaintiff] whenever born as being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty one or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry as a single class and if more than one in equal shares.

‘2. DURING such period as no child of either of the said sons is in existence the income of the Appointed Share shall be held in trust for the said two sons in equal shares.

‘3. SUBJECT as is mentioned in the next following clause the powers of maintenance and advancement implied by the Trustee Act 1925 or any statute amending or replacing the same shall apply to the Appointed Share.

‘4. IF and to the extent that any of the trusts aforesaid shall fail whether by reason that no child of either of the said sons shall attain a vested interest or that any implied directions for the accumulation of income shall be in excess of that permitted by law or for any other reason the capital and income of the Appointed Share or so much of such capital and income as that the trusts whereof shall fail to have effect shall be held in trust for and belong to the said two sons in equal shares absolutely.

‘5. THE Appointor DOTH HEREBY RELEASE unto the Trustees all that the life

a or other the interest of the Appointor in the Appointed Share and the income thereof to the intent that such life or other interest shall be wholly extinguished and that the Appointed Share and all income received by the Trustees hereafter shall without apportionment of such income be held upon the trusts of these presents.'

b At the time when the appointment was made the first plaintiff had one child only, Margaret Catharine Edmondson, who was born on 7th November 1947, and was therefore less than a year old at the date of appointment. The second plaintiff had no child at that time. Subsequently the first plaintiff had three more children, i.e. four children in all, and the second plaintiff had, since the date of the appointment, also had four children. There was therefore a class of eight individuals in existence and prospectively or actually interested under the appointment. The oldest of the eight was 23 years old, the youngest was 13 years old. Of the eight, three had attained the age of 21, and five were still under that age. In addition the second plaintiff had recently married for the second time, his wife being only 30 years of age.

c On 2nd April 1949 the first Lord Sandford conveyed certain freehold and leasehold properties to trustees directing that they might either retain the properties for so long as they might think fit or might at any time or times sell the properties or any of them or any part or parts thereof. After payment of the costs of sale the trustees were to hold the net moneys arising from the sale and the net rents and profits until sale on the trusts declared by a deed of settlement of the same date. By virtue of s 25 (4) of the Law of Property Act 1925 the provisions in the conveyance giving the trustees the power to retain or sell operated as a trust to sell with an indefinite power to postpone sale at their discretion. The settlement of the same date, having referred to the proceeds of the sale of the properties as 'the Trust Fund', provided by cl 2:

d 'THE Trustees shall hold the Trust Fund Upon trust for such of the children of the two sons of the Settlor namely . . . [the first plaintiff] and [the second plaintiff] as being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty one years or being a daughter shall attain that age or marry as a single class and if more than one e in equal shares.'

By an originating summons dated 11th January 1971 the plaintiffs as trustees of the testator's will, of the deed of appointment of 25th July 1948, and of the settlement of 2nd April 1949, sought the determination of the court on the following questions: (1) whether, on the true construction of the deed of appointment of 25th July 1948 and in the events which had happened, the appointed share mentioned in that deed was held: (i) in trust for such of the children of the plaintiffs as had been born before 7th November 1968 (the date when the eldest of such children attained the age of 21) and had attained or should attain 21 or (being female) should marry under that age in equal shares per capita, or (ii) in trust for such of the children of the plaintiffs whenever born (whether before or after 7th November 1968) as had attained or should attain 21 or (being female) should marry under that age in equal shares per capita, or (iii) on some other and what trusts; (2) whether, on the true construction of the settlement of 2nd April 1949 and in the events which had happened, the trust fund mentioned in that settlement was held: (i) in trust for such of the children of the plaintiffs as had been born before 7th November 1968 (the date when the eldest of such children attained the age of 21) and had attained or should attain 21 or (being female) should marry under that age in equal shares per capita, or (ii) in trust for such of the children of the plaintiffs whenever born (whether before or after 7th November 1968) as had attained or should attain 21 or (being female) should marry under that age in equal shares per capita, or (iii) on some other and what trusts. There were joined as defendants the eight children of the plaintiffs, namely, the Hon Margaret Catharine Edmondson, the Hon James John Mowbray Edmondson,

Charles Anthony Edmondson, Elizabeth Ann Edmondson, the Hon Frances Mary Edmondson, the Hon Nicholas Mark Edmondson, Simon Andrew Edmondson and Anthony James Edmondson. a

By his judgment Goulding J declared that, in answer to question (1), on the true construction of the deed of appointment and in the events which had happened the appointed share was held in trust for such of the defendants as were born before 7th November 1968, the date when the eldest of them attained the age of 21, and had attained or should attain 21, or being female should marry under that age, in equal shares per capita; and that question (2) should be answered in the same sense as question (1). b

Cur adv vult c

22nd November. RUSSELL LJ delivered the following judgment of the court. This appeal concerns the applicability of the rule known as the rule in *Andrews v Partington*¹ to the trusts of two instruments. The two questions were joined in one originating summons because the trustees and beneficiaries and possible future beneficiaries are in each case the same; but otherwise the two questions are quite distinct. The decision of Goulding J in each case was that the rule applied. Since the decisions are reported², we need not set out the circumstances in great detail. d

The first question concerns the appointment by the first Lord Sandford by deed dated 25th July 1948 of a fund in which he had a life interest and a special power of appointment among his issue. He appointed in equal shares to a class consisting of the children of his two named sons at 21 or if female earlier marriage. At the same time he released his life interest. At that date there was only one such child, of tender years. Before any grandchild attained a vested interest the appointor died; accordingly, if the rule applies, the class of grandchildren to take closed when the first grandchild attained the age of 21 on 7th November 1968. The appointor's second son has married for a second time and may well have further children. The plaintiffs on behalf of any such future children argue that they will be included in the class, the rule not applying. The defendants, consisting of children of the two sons born before 7th November 1968, contend the contrary. e

We say at once that it appears to us that the question turns solely on the significance to be attached to the words 'whenever born' in the phrase in cl 1 of the deed of appointment: f

'. . . upon trust for such of the children of [the plaintiffs] whenever born as being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty one or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry as a single class and if more than one in equal shares.'

g

Neither side in our judgment could derive any support for its arguments from cl 2, 4 or 5 of the appointment. For the plaintiffs it was argued that the provision in cl 3 that 'the powers of maintenance and advancement implied by the Trustee Act 1925 . . . shall apply to' the appointed funds, was inconsistent with the applicability of the rule, or at least gave some indication in that regard. We do not accept that. That clause is consistent equally with the class closing when the first member attained a vested interest (or, had it occurred later, the death of the life tenant appointor), and with the class remaining open until the death of the survivor of the appointor's two sons. In this regard Re Henderson's Trusts, *Schreiber v Baring*³, was quite different; there the language of the document itself in terms envisaged the possible existence of a vested presumptive share under the trusts declared, that is to say that a beneficiary h a having attained 21 was nevertheless liable to have the fraction of that share reduced by later additions to the class.

There are many reported cases on the applicability of this rule and the reasons for it. We do not think it necessary to recapitulate them. We believe that the question in this and other cases may be briefly thus stated: 'Is it clear from the language of the instrument in the circumstances in which that language is used that the rule is not applicable?' In the present case without the words 'whenever born' b in cl 1 there is no doubt that the rule would apply. In the reported cases there are instances in which phrases descriptive of the class in apparently unlimited and general terms have been held not to exclude the rule, on the ground that they were capable of referring only to the period before the application of the rule would close the class. Among such phrases we find 'all the children... whether now born or c hereafter to be born'; 'all and every the children of X'; 'the children of X as many as there might be'; 'all or any the children or child of X'. Goulding J⁴ considered that it would be too great a refinement to draw a distinction between such phrases (and in particular the phrase 'whether now living or hereafter to be born') and the words 'whenever born'. He described as tempting, and we think that in the end he succumbed to the temptation, to say that both phrases covered the future without d any express limit and, therefore, why should the latter phrase disclose an intention to hold up the possibility of distribution of the shares of those with a vested interest?

We do not find this proposition thus tempting. In our view there is an important distinction between the two phrases. The former is a general phrase pointing towards the future and, therefore, to some time in the future. The phrase 'whenever born' is in our view a specific and emphatic phrase which in terms points to all time e in the future. It is equivalent to 'at whatever time they may be born', and is limited only by the course of nature to the lifetime of the parents. If the phrase had been 'whenever in the lifetime of their respective parents born' there could be surely no doubt that the class was clearly defined as remaining open to membership by all grandchildren: just as was the case in *Scott v Earl of Scarborough*⁵ where the phrase was 'hereafter be born, during the lifetime of their respective parents'. (It is true that f there was in that case apparently another phrase also which showed that the rule was inapplicable: although oddly enough this was not the phrase relied on.) If the phrase used was 'now born or hereafter at whatever time to be born' surely the rule would be excluded; and 'whenever born' is to our minds the precise equivalent. In summary the phrase 'born or hereafter to be born' is a general reference to the future without g express limit in time and, therefore, consistent with a limit in time imposed by the direction for vesting and the rule. But 'whenever born' is a particular reference to the future expressly unlimited in time and, therefore, readily to be distinguished as inconsistent with a time limitation such as is imposed by the rule.

We were referred to a number of occasions in judgments and textbooks where the words 'whenever born' seem to have come naturally to the lips or pen when the speaker or writer wished to refer to a situation in which the rule was not applied. h It may well be that these instances do not establish the proposition for which the plaintiffs have contended; but they can certainly do nothing to weaken their argument. Instances of this were *Jarman on Wills*⁶; *Hawkins on Wills*⁷; *Re Bleckly (decd)*⁸; *Re Wernher's Settlement Trusts*⁹; *Re Ketby-Fletcher's Will Trusts*¹⁰; *Theobald on Wills*¹¹. We would refer to the fact that in their work on Real Property¹² by Megarry and Wade the authors suggest that the words 'whenever born' do not exclude the rule; but for this view they rely on a reference to *Scott v Earl of Scarborough*¹³ which does not support it.

Accordingly in our judgment the rule in *Andrews v Partington*¹⁴ is excluded in the case of the appointment by the words 'whenever born' and the class will embrace all children of the sons whether born before or after the attainment by the first of a vested interest on 7th November 1968. On this aspect of the case the appeal will be allowed and an appropriate declaration substituted.

We turn now to the second part of the case. The settlor (also the first Lord Sandford) on 2nd April 1949 conveyed certain freehold and leasehold properties to trustees on trust to retain or sell, a trust which by the Law of Property Act 1925 was the equivalent of an immediate binding trust for sale with power in the discretion of the trustees to postpone that sale. By a contemporaneous settlement of the proceeds of sale the trust fund was to be held on trust in equal shares for the sons of the same two sons of the settlor at 21 and daughters at 21 or earlier marriage. The words 'whenever born' were absent. Prima facie, therefore, the rule applies and the class closed on 7th November 1968.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, mounted an elaborate argument based on the following contentions. First, that authority showed that a beneficiary with a vested interest in the case of land settled on trust for sale had no right on attaining a vested interest to demand sale and transfer of his share or presumptive share of the proceeds. Secondly, that the function of the rule was to enable a member of a class to claim as of right payment or transfer of his minimum share on attaining a vested interest. And thirdly, that consequently where at the time of the settlement the property settled was solely land the rule had no operation. Goulding J¹⁵ in part rejected this contention on the ground that the land was to be treated as converted into personalty. We did not call on counsel for the defendants on this point. We think that the answer to the plaintiffs' contention is a short one. The function of the rule is to enable trustees to distribute by removing uncertainty; or if it be to enable a beneficiary who has attained a vested interest to claim his minimum share, it is to enable the claim to be made but subject to the due and proper exercise by the trustees of the administrative powers and directions to which the whole trust and every share therein is subject. We do not regard *Blackman v Fysh*¹⁶ as at all a satisfactory authority for the proposition that the rule is not applicable when the only property settled was land; we share on this the view of Eve J in *Re Canney's Trusts*¹⁷. It would in our view introduce an absurdity if in a given case the rule would be applicable if at the time of the settlement the settled property were £100,000 in value of land and £100 in value of personalty, but not applicable if the personalty were lacking, even though at the time for decision of the point the whole trust property consisted of marketable securities.

Consequently the appeal on this second point fails.

Appeal on the first point allowed. Appeal on the second point dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Coast Lines Ltd v Hudig & Veder Chartering NV

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, MEGAW AND STEPHENSON LJJ

16th, 17th NOVEMBER, 7th DECEMBER 1971

Conflict of laws – Contract – Proper law of contract – Charterparty – Law with which transaction has closest and most real connection – Charterparty between English owners and Dutch charterers – Factors pointing to English or Dutch law equally balanced – Subject-matter of charterparty English ship – Relevance of law of flag – Claim by owners based on exemption clause – Clause invalid under Dutch law – English law proper law.

Practice – Service – Service out of jurisdiction – Charterparty between English owners and Dutch charterers – Charterparty governed by English law – Charterers' residence and principal place of business in Holland – Charterers having no place of business or assets in England – Claim by owners based on exemption clause – Dutch law compelling Dutch courts to disregard exemption clause even though charterparty governed by English law – Leave to serve notice of writ out of jurisdiction – RSC Ord 11, r 1 (f).

The plaintiff shipowners, an English company, chartered their ship to the defendant charterers, whose residence and principal place of business was in Rotterdam and who had no place of business or assets in England. The charterparty was signed in Rotterdam following negotiations by telephone and telex between the charterers in Rotterdam and the shipowners' agents in Cardiff. The charterparty, which was in English in the Gencon form, provided for the carriage of cargo from Rotterdam to Ireland. It contained a clause exempting the shipowners from damage to goods caused by unseaworthiness of the vessel unless the unseaworthiness was attributable to want of due diligence on the part of the shipowners or their manager personally. It contained no express provision as to the law governing the contract. The bill of lading was issued in Rotterdam signed by agents on behalf of the master. It contained a clause binding the shipowners to exercise due diligence to make the ship seaworthy and making them liable for want of due diligence, thereby subjecting them to a greater liability than that provided by the charterparty. On the voyage the cargo was damaged as a result of the unseaworthy condition of the vessel. The shipowners admitted liability to the cargo owners under the terms of the bill of lading and, on the basis of their restricted liability for unseaworthiness under the charterparty, claimed an indemnity against the charterers. Under the Netherlands Commercial Code in force at the material time, a clause in a charterparty, such as that in the Gencon form, restricting the shipowners' liability for damage due to unseaworthiness was rendered null and void; furthermore the relevant provisions of the code applied to all cases of carriage of goods by sea from Netherlands ports even though the parties had expressly chosen some law other than Netherlands law as the proper law of the contract. The shipowners applied for leave to serve notice of the writ on the charterers out of the jurisdiction under RSC Ord 11, r 1 (f), on the basis that the charterparty was governed by English law.

Held – (i) (Stephenson LJ dubitante) Although the factors pointing to English law or Netherlands law as that with which the contract had its closest and most real connection were evenly balanced, the proper law of the charterparty was English law for the following reasons—

(a) (per Lord Denning MR) in a contract of charterparty, other things being equal, the law of the flag, in this case English law, should govern it (see p 455 h and j, post);

(b) (per Megaw LJ) the connection which had to be sought was that between the transaction and the system of law, which meant that, where the parties had not expressed their intention, more importance was to be attached to what was to be done under the contract—its substance—than considerations of form and formalities; in the present case the subject-matter of the charterparty was an English ship and the whole of the transaction contemplated by the contract concerned the activities of that English ship (see p 457 g to p 458 a and g, post);

(c) (per Lord Denning MR) the contract contained an exemption clause which was valid under English law but invalid under Netherlands law and applying the principle that a contract should be so construed as to make it valid rather than invalid, this was a pointer to English law as the proper law (see p 456 a and b, post); P & O Steam Navigation Co v Shand (1865) 3 Moo PC 272 and dictum of Lord Halsbury LC in Re Missouri Steamship Co (1889) 42 Ch D at 337 applied.

(ii) The proper law being English law, leave should be given to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction; as the charterers were a Netherlands company, owing no allegiance in England and having no place of business there, it would not be appropriate to grant leave if the Netherlands courts were free to apply English law as the proper law; however, since the Netherlands courts were not free to do so, being compelled to apply a special law of the Netherlands which was not the proper law of the contract and which was out of line with the maritime law of all other countries, the shipowners should not be compelled to pursue their claim in the Netherlands courts (see p 456 f, p 460 e and f and p 462 b, post).

Interlocutory appeal

- a This was an appeal against an order of Roskill J made on 28th July 1971 refusing the application of the charterers, Hudig & Veder Chartering NV, for an order that the order of Master Hyamson, dated 20th May 1970, giving leave to the shipowners, Coast Lines Ltd, on an ex parte application, to issue a writ of summons against the charterers and to serve notice thereof on them at Rotterdam, Holland, be set aside.

Cur adv vult

- c 7th December. The following judgments were read.

- LORD DENNING MR. In December 1967 an English company, Coast Lines Ltd who are the owners of the mv Grangefield, let her on a voyage charter to a Dutch company—Hudig & Veder Chartering NV. Under the charter, the vessel was to proceed to Rotterdam and there load a cargo and carry it to Drogheda, a port in the Republic of Ireland. The cargo was loaded at Rotterdam, but the vessel ran into very bad weather conditions. When she arrived at Drogheda it was found that some 65 tons of water had been taken inboard. The cargo was badly damaged. The water had got in by a broken bilge sounding pipe. The pipe was found to be extremely rusty, corroded and wasted. The vessel cannot have been in a seaworthy condition when she started on the voyage. The cargo owners claimed damages from the shipowners. The shipowners admitted liability to the cargo owners, but then the shipowners claimed to be indemnified by the charterers.
- e

On 28th May 1970 the shipowners, Coast Lines Ltd, issued a writ against the charterers, Hudig & Veder Chartering NV, indorsed as follows:

- f 'THE PLAINTIFFS CLAIM is for an indemnity under and/or damages for breach of a contract by Charter Party dated the 13th December 1967 whereby the Defendants hired the plaintiffs' motor vessel "GRANGEFIELD" in respect of the Plaintiffs' liability under Bill of Lading signed in accordance therewith at the request of the Defendants.'

- g The shipowners applied ex parte to the master for leave to serve the writ on the proposed defendants, the charterers, out of the jurisdiction. The master gave leave. The charterers entered a conditional appearance and applied to set aside the service. Roskill J refused to set it aside. The charterers appeal to this court.

1. The charterparty

- h The charterparty is dated 'Rotterdam 13th December, 1967'. It was for carriage of cargo from Rotterdam in the Netherlands to Drogheda in Ireland. The negotiations leading to the fixture of the Grangefield were conducted over the telephone and on the telex between the charterers in Rotterdam and J F Thomas & Co Ltd (brokers for the shipowners) in Cardiff. It is customary in the Netherlands for the charterers' brokers to draw up and sign the charterparty. This charterparty was drawn up in Rotterdam and signed there on behalf of both parties by the charterers. Copies were subsequently sent to J F Thomas & Co Ltd. The charterparty was made in the Gencon form. This is the form of charterparty which is the most widely used by all those in Rotterdam who are engaged in the European shipping trade. The Gencon form is used, irrespective of whether or not the charterparty has any connection with England or whether or not either party is English.
- j

The charterparty contained an exemption for the shipowners in the terms usual in the Gencon form:

'Owners are to be responsible for loss of or damage to the goods or for delay in delivery of the goods only in case the loss, damage or delay has been caused by the improper or negligent stowage of the goods (unless stowage performed by shippers or their stevedores or servants) or by personal want of due diligence on the part of the Owners or their Manager to make the vessel in all respects seaworthy and to secure that she is properly manned, equipped and supplied or by the personal act or default of the Owners or their Manager.

'And the Owners are responsible for no loss or damage or delay arising from any other cause whatsoever, even from the neglect or default of the Captain or crew of some other person employed by the Owners on board or ashore for whose acts they would, but for this clause, be responsible, or for unseaworthiness of the vessel on loading or commencement of the voyage or at any time whatsoever . . .

'The Captain to sign Bills of Lading at such rate of freight as presented without prejudice to this Charterparty . . .'

It is apparent from that clause that the shipowners were relieved—so far as the charterers were concerned—of any liability for the damage done to these goods; for, although the damage was due to the vessel being unseaworthy, nevertheless this was no fault of the owners or manager personally. It was quite permissible in English law for the shipowners to stipulate in the charterparty for that exemption, because the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924 does not apply to charterparties.

2. The bill of lading

The bill of lading was issued in Rotterdam. It was for the carriage of 4,000 paper bags of bleaching earth (made in Germany) from Rotterdam to Drogheda. It was signed by agents on behalf of the master. It was in English and contained on the back a clause paramount which incorporated the Hague Rules. It bound the shipowner to exercise due diligence to make the ship seaworthy and made him liable for want of due diligence. It made the shipowner liable, therefore, in this case to the cargo owner.

It is apparent that, under that bill of lading, the shipowners were subject to a greater liability than that provided by the charterparty. The charterers must take responsibility for the presentation of that bill of lading. By that conduct the charterers imposed on the shipowners a greater liability than was stipulated for in the charterparty. On this account it has been held that the charterers were under a duty to indemnify the shipowners: see *Kruger & Co Ltd v Moel Tryvan Ship Co Ltd*¹. This duty may be said to arise from the request of the charterers to the master to sign the bills of lading. But I would prefer to put it on an implied term in the charterparty to the effect that, in case the charterers should present—or cause to be presented—bills of lading imposing a greater liability on the shipowners than that contained in the charterparty, the charterers would indemnify the shipowners in respect of that greater liability.

3. English law and Netherlands law

If the charterparty is governed by English law, the shipowners will be able to rely on the indemnity of which I have just spoken. They will be entitled to call on the charterers to indemnify them against the liability to the cargo owners. The Hague Rules will not apply. But, if the charterparty is governed by Netherlands law, the position will be quite different. The Netherlands Commercial Code (as it existed at the time of this shipment—it has been altered since) contained an art 517d which applied the Hague Rules to the carriage of goods by sea from Netherlands ports; and this has been held by the courts of the Netherlands to apply, not only to bills of lading, but also to charterparties; and to override any stipulation, express or a implied, to the contrary. Even if a charterparty expressly says that it is to be governed by some other law, e.g. English law, nevertheless art 517d is regarded as mandatory to the Netherlands courts. They must apply the Netherlands Commercial Code to every shipment from a Netherlands port. If the shipowners should, therefore, sue the charterers in the Netherlands courts—or the charterers sue the shipowners—those courts must ignore English law altogether—they must ignore the exemption clause in the charterparty and the implications from it—they must hold that the shipowners are liable to the full extent set out in the Hague Rules, and cannot claim indemnity from the charterers.

b In making this mandatory provision binding on their courts, the Netherlands are out on a limb by themselves. In an ideal world it would be different. If a contract is properly held to be governed by English law, then the courts of every country should apply English law to it. The Netherlands Commercial Code goes against this ideal. It says that every cargo of goods from a Netherlands port is to be governed by Netherlands law, no matter that the contract has nothing else to do with the Netherlands. We are told that since 1969 the Netherlands have withdrawn this mandatory provision. They have come into line with the other maritime countries. So the point may not in future arise. But we have to deal with the position as it was in 1967.

c In view of this difference, we have to consider these points: 1. What is the proper law of the contract? If it is Netherlands law, then the Netherlands Commercial Code will apply. The shipowners will not be entitled to an indemnity. If it is English law, and the case is allowed to proceed in the English courts, then the English courts will apply English law, and will give the shipowners an indemnity. But, if the shipowners are forced to sue in the Netherlands courts, those courts will (despite the contract being governed by English law) apply the Netherlands Commercial Code to it, and will refuse an indemnity. 2. If the proper law is English law, ought these courts to allow service out of the jurisdiction so that the case can proceed in the English courts, or should they refuse and force the shipowners to go to the Netherlands courts?

f 4. The proper law of the contract

In order to determine the proper law of the contract, the courts at one time used to have a number of presumptions to help them. Now we have to ask ourselves: what is the system of law with which the transaction has the closest and most real connection? This is not dependent on the intentions of the parties. They never thought about it. They had no intentions on it. We have to study every circumstance connected with the contract and come to a conclusion. This new test is all very well. It is often easy to apply. But, there are sometimes cases where it is quite indecisive. The circumstances do not point to one country only. They point equally to two countries, or even to three. What then is a legal adviser to do? What is an arbitrator or a judge to do? Is he to toss up a coin and see which way it comes down? Surely not. The law ought to give some help. It ought to provide a pointer to a solution, if only as a last resort. One such pointer is that, in a contract of charterparty, other things being equal, the law of the ship should govern: see *Lloyd v Guibert*² and *The Assunzione*³ per Hodson LJ in a passage quoted by Roskill J.

h Apply the test here. One important circumstance is that the contract was made in Rotterdam by Dutch charterers for shipment at Rotterdam. That points to Netherlands law. Another important circumstance is that the contract was for carriage in an English ship owned by English owners for carriage on the high seas. That points to English law. Put those two into the scales, one on one side, the other on the other. You find they are equal. Other circumstances point one way, then another. There is nothing to choose. So, as a last resort, you take the law of the flag, which is English law.

2 (1865) LR 1 QB 115

3 [1954] 1 All ER 278 at 300, [1954] P 150 at 194

But then there is a further consideration. The contract contained an exemption clause which was valid under English law, but invalid under Netherlands law. That, I think, is important. In the maritime law of this country—and I believe of all other maritime countries—it is an accepted principle that a contract is, if possible, to be construed so as to make it valid rather than invalid. The Latin maxim is well known. A stipulation must be construed ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Applying it here, the exemption clause in the charterparty is valid by English law, but invalid by Netherlands law. That is a pointer to English law as the proper law of the contract. For this simple reason it cannot be assumed that the Dutch charterers put their signatures to a contract which they did not intend to honour. This is supported by opinion of the Privy Council in *P & O Steam Navigation Co v Shand*⁴; and by the judgment of Lord Halsbury LC in *Re Missouri Steamship Co*⁵.

I would add another consideration also. The commercial judge (Roskill J) has held that the proper law is English law. We should be slow to differ from him on such a point. As Lord Wilberforce said recently, 'decision by the commercial judge should end the matter': see *Compagnie d'Armement Maritime SA v Compagnie Tunisienne de Navigation SA*⁶.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the proper law of this contract is English law, and not Netherlands law.

5. The exercise of their discretion

Once it is held that the charterparty is by implication governed by English law, the next question is whether leave should be given to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction? This is a very serious question. The charterers are a Netherlands company. They owe no allegiance here. They have no place of business here. They have, as yet, no assets here. It is a strong thing to force them to come to England to contest a case against them. So we must be exceedingly careful before doing so. That was pointed out long ago: *The Hagen*⁷. If the Netherlands courts were free to apply the proper law of the contract (i.e. English law), I would not be disposed to grant leave to serve out of the jurisdiction. But the Netherlands courts are not free. They are compelled by the Netherlands law to apply a special law of the Netherlands (i.e. art 517d), which is not the proper law of the contract and which is out of line with the maritime law of all other countries. The Netherlands courts are compelled to apply a law which is contrary to the general understanding of commercial men. In these circumstances, I do not think we should send the English shipowners to the Netherlands courts. We should retain the case in these courts where we can and will apply English law, which is the proper law of the contract.

I know that the charterers can avoid our English law by refusing to submit to the jurisdiction of the English courts. In that case any judgment of the English courts will not be enforceable in the Netherlands under the arrangements for the reciprocal enforcement of judgment; see the Reciprocal Enforcement of Foreign Judgments (The Netherlands) Order 1969, art III (2) (a) and IV (1)⁸. The English shipowners would then be forced to sue in the Netherlands, and the courts there would, no doubt, apply the Netherlands Commercial Code. So, in a sense, the matter rests with the charterers. But, so far as these courts are concerned, I think that leave should be given to serve out of the jurisdiction.

I agree with the judgment of Roskill J and I would dismiss the appeal.

MEGAW LJ. The facts as to the making of this charterparty and as to the transaction which it covered have been stated by Lord Denning MR.

a The shipowners, Coast Lines Ltd, claim that they ought to be allowed to serve notice of their writ out of the jurisdiction on the charterers, Hudig & Veder Chartering NV, in the Netherlands. The charterers contend that leave ought to have been refused. For the shipowners' submission that this is a proper case for the English courts to assert jurisdiction against a defendant who has not been served with the writ in this country, the shipowners rely, and rely solely, on para (f) (iii) of RSC Ord 11, r 1: that is, that the contract in respect of which they seek relief is 'by implication governed by English law. The charterers contend that the contract is governed by the law of the Netherlands. That, therefore, is the first issue. It has to be decided on the basis of the principles of private international law as applied by the English courts. If that issue be answered in favour of English law as being the proper law of the contract, a second issue arises: since the granting of an order under RSC Ord 11, r 1, is always discretionary, should that discretion be exercised in favour of the shipowners in this case?

c Counsel for the charterers has submitted that if the case falls to be decided by the Netherlands courts the shipowners' claim must fail. On the uncontradicted evidence of an expert in Netherlands law, that would certainly seem to be so. On the other hand, he suggests that if English law is applied as the proper law of the contract, the shipowners would be, at least, very likely to succeed. That may be; although for myself I should prefer at this stage not to express any concluded opinion on that matter. It may fall to be argued hereafter.

d What is the proper law of the contract? In this charterparty the parties did not express their actual intention as to the proper law. No inference can be drawn from any one or more of the express terms of the contract as to the actual common intention of the parties. Hence the question to be answered is: what is the system of law with which the transaction has its closest and most real connection?

e This test has its origin with Professor Westlake (see Cheshire's Private International Law⁹). It was first adopted by Lord Simonds in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in *Bonython v Commonwealth of Australia*¹⁰. A decade later it was accepted explicitly for purposes of English private international law by the House of Lords in *Re United Railways of the Havana and Regla Warehouses Ltd*¹¹: see Lord Denning's speech¹² and that of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest¹³. It has recently been reaffirmed in *Compagnie d'Armement Maritime SA v Compagnie Tunisienne de Navigation SA*¹⁴, in which Lord Reid¹⁵, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest¹⁶ and Lord Diplock¹⁷, accepted and applied the Bonython test¹⁸ of the closest and most real connection with the transaction.

g I think it is not without significance to note that the connection which has to be sought is expressed to be connection between the transaction, i.e. the transaction contemplated by the contract, and the system of law. That, I believe, indicates that, where the actual intention of the parties as to the proper law is not expressed in, and cannot be inferred from, the terms of the contract (so that it is impossible to apply the earlier part of the Bonython formula¹⁸, the system of law 'by reference to which the contract was made'¹⁹), more importance is to be attached to what is to be done under the contract—its substance—than to considerations of the form and formalities of the contract or considerations of what may, without disrespect, be described as lawyers' points as to inferences to be drawn from the terms of the contract. a

With which system of law did this transaction—the business transaction of the provision of a ship which would carry goods from Rotterdam to Drogheda—have its closest and most real connection? The shipowners were English, the charterers were Dutch. The charterparty, having been negotiated across the seas, was dated 'Rotterdam, 13th December 1967'. It was only in that somewhat technical sense that the contract was 'made' there. It was in the English language. In the light of the uncontradicted evidence, that is not a matter of great weight in this case in favour of the English legal system. The fact that the freight and demurrage were expressed in sterling deserves slightly greater weight, although, again, it is not a strong factor in the light of the evidence. The loading of the vessel was to take place in Rotterdam and bills of lading were to be issued there. To that extent performance of the obligations of the contract was connected with the Netherlands. So far as the bills of lading were concerned, it might well be that the fact that they were issued in Rotterdam in respect of goods loaded there would be a conclusive, or at least a powerful, indication that the proper law of the contracts to which they might give rise would be the law of the Netherlands. But different considerations apply to the two types of contract—charterparty contracts and bill of lading contracts, as is indeed evidenced by the Hague Rules, based on international convention, to which I shall have to refer further on the second issue. b

Against this connection with the Netherlands system of law, arising out of the fact that an important part of the transaction was to be carried out in Netherlands territory, it is necessary to set the fact that the principle subject-matter of the charterparty, on a sensible business view of the transaction, was the ship. A voyage charterparty, while normally containing detailed provision for dealing with the goods to be carried, not only at the port or ports of loading but also during the voyage and at the port or ports of discharge, is primarily and in essence a contract for the provision of services of—the use of—a specified, named, ship. This may be contrasted with a bill of lading contract where it could sensibly be said that the principal subject-matter of the contract is the goods covered by the bill of lading. The ship here chartered was, to put it shortly, English. The flag was British, with English registration and English ownership. It would not be right to place too much stress on the rule of public international law (see Oppenheim's *International Law*²⁰) that 'vessels, and the things and persons thereon, remain during the time they are on the open sea under the jurisdiction of the State under whose flag they sail', and that they are in many respects to be treated as 'floating portions of the flag State'. But to my mind the fact that the subject-matter of the charterparty was an English ship and that the whole of the transaction contemplated by the contract concerned the activities of that English ship, in loading, carrying and discharging the cargo, produces the result that the transaction, viewed as a whole and weighing all the relevant factors, has a closer and more real connection with English law than with the law of the Netherlands. c

It may be suggested that this is to bring back into English private international law a presumption—the presumption of the law of the flag—as prima facie determinant of the proper law. Presumptions, once fashionable during the earlier development of English private international law, are now, whether for good or for ill, out of fashion and rejected. That, indeed, is a necessary result of the adoption of the 'closest and most real connection' test. No single factor is to be treated as, prima facie, providing the answer. I would go so far as to say that in a charterparty case the flag of the vessel is likely normally to be important. But it must be considered along with all the other relevant factors. Weighing it, as best I can, with and against the other relevant aspects of this transaction, I think that the result is as I have indicated. Therefore English law is the proper law of the charterparty contract. d a Let me suppose that I am wrong (as may well be the case) in suggesting that a significant distinction was intended between the words 'contract' and 'transaction' in the *Bonython*¹ formula. It would follow that one would then be entitled, in a case such as this, to give substantial weight to considerations arising out of the legal effect of the contractual terms, according as one system of law or the other might be held to be applicable; and this, even though there may be no reason to suppose that the parties had any such consideration in mind. (This would, I think, reflect Dicey's 'inferred intention'², approved, with a reservation, by Lord Wilberforce in *Compagnie d'Armement Maritime SA v Compagnie Tunisienne de Navigation SA*³). On that supposition, the case in favour of English law would in my view be overwhelming. For an important term which the parties agreed to incorporate into this contract would be valid under English law, but would be a nullity under the law of the Netherlands. It was such a point as this, on the 'inferred intention' theory of the law, which was a determinant factor, in Lord Halsbury LC's judgment, in *Re Missouri Steamship Co*⁴. For myself, however, I am inclined to think that this consideration is effective only to negative any argument that the terms of the contract show an actual intention of the parties that Netherlands law should govern.

d It is necessary now to consider the second issue: should the discretion which exists under RSC Ord 11, r 1, be exercised so as to found jurisdiction in England against the Netherlands charterers. The principal argument of counsel for the charterers is that in all the circumstances it would be contrary to comity to permit the writ to be served out of the jurisdiction. There is, however, one factor here, to be found in the uncontradicted evidence of an expert in Netherlands law, which has led me to the conclusion that that argument ought not to prevail.

e The Hague Rules, accepted as a result of international agreement, were expressly and deliberately restricted to bill of lading contracts. Charterparties were not included, for it was the general consensus that freedom of contract should remain in respect of them. The Netherlands Commercial Code, as it stood at the time which is relevant for this case, restricted freedom of contract by applying the Hague Rules restrictions in respect of all contracts for the carriage of goods by sea from Netherlands ports, irrespective whether the relevant contract was, or was evidenced by, a charterparty or a bill of lading. That was the combined effect of arts 517d, 466 and 468 to 480 of the Code. We are told that charterparties have now been excluded by amendment of the Code. But we must, of course, deal with this case, as presumably the Netherlands courts would have to deal with it if it came before them, on the basis of the law as it was in December 1967.

g The result of those provisions of the Code was, first, that in Netherlands municipal law the express provisions of the Gencon charterparty, limiting the owner's liability so that it falls below the level permitted by that law, would be null and void. But there was a further consequence, affecting the operation of private international law as applied by the Netherlands courts. This is stated by Dr Boeles, an expert in Netherlands law, in his affidavit on behalf of the charterers, as follows:

h '10. It is, however, not permissible for the parties to a contract, where Article 517 (d) applies, to choose as the proper law of the relevant contract a law other than Netherlands law. Article 517 (d) is a mandatory provision. It applies Articles 468 to 480 to all cases of the carriage of goods by sea from Netherlands ports: (i) even though the parties to the contract of carriage expressly choose some law other than Netherlands law as the proper law of the contract; (ii) even though the contract of carriage has the closest connection with some system of law other than Netherlands law; (iii) even though the parties provide that the Courts of some country, other than the Netherlands, shall have sole jurisdiction over all disputes; and (iv) even though the contract contains an arbitration clause whereunder all disputes are to be referred to arbitration in some country other than the Netherlands.

'11. The above principles are illustrated by a number of decisions of the Netherlands Courts . . .'

If this requirement (a requirement founded, no doubt, on what was at the time regarded as a matter of public policy in the Netherlands, which involved the ignoring or overriding of that which would otherwise have been the proper law of the contract) had related to ensuring the enforcement of the spirit or the letter of an accepted international convention (for example, the Hague Rules in relation solely to bills of lading) or had related to the prevention of an avoidance of such generally accepted rules by the device of making the contract subject to the law of another state, I should have been disposed to say that the English courts should, in their discretion, have refused leave to serve out of the jurisdiction. That would have been a proper instance of giving effect to the requirements of comity. But that is not the case here. Netherlands law at the relevant time was based on a refusal to allow freedom of contract in respect of a charterparty, provided that there was involved any carriage of goods from any Netherlands port, whether or not it was the first port of loading under the relevant charterparty and whether or not there was any other element connecting the transaction with the Netherlands. On the other hand, the relevant international convention had, at least by implication, indicated that this was not a sphere in which the consensus of opinion, internationally, favoured such a restriction. If English law is the proper law of the contract, and the contract does not offend against the public policy of this country or what may be called the general public policy of maritime nations, to be implied from the terms of the international convention, comity, in my view, does not demand that a party who desires to have his dispute decided in accordance with the proper law of the contract should be precluded from having it so decided. That, on the evidence, would be the consequence of a refusal of leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction in this case.

Accordingly, in agreement with Roskill J and, I believe, for substantially the same reasons, I would hold that this is a proper case in which the discretion should be exercised under RSC Ord 11, r 1. I would dismiss the appeal.

STEPHENSON LJ. I have found difficulty in answering both the questions raised by this appeal.

What is the proper law of this contract, English or Dutch? This question cannot be answered by ascertaining the actual intention of the parties. If they had applied their minds to it the English shipowners would probably have answered 'English' and the Dutch charterers 'Dutch'. If they had been asked to agree on the application of the other's law to the charterparty each would probably have refused and there would have been no contract; but there is a contract: cf *The Assunzione*⁵ per Singleton LJ. The parties have not expressed their actual choice of the proper law to govern this contract. So the court has to infer the intention, which they have not expressed and one of them would probably disclaim, from the terms and the nature of the contract and from the relevant contemporary circumstances; or, if that is impossible, to ascertain the country and system of law with which the contract and transaction have the closest and most real connection: *James Miller and Partners Ltd v Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd*⁶ and *Compagnie d'Armement Maritime SA v Compagnie Tunisienne de Navigation SA*⁷. I think that the insertions of 'the country' and 'the transaction' in this formulation of Professor Cheshire's so-called 'localization' test a have the significance respectively attributed to them by Lord Reid in the former case⁸ and by Megaw LJ in the instant case.

Which country and system of law is that? This question has now to be answered without the help of any presumptions and simply by weighing all the elements and circumstances of the contract and its contemplated performance and deciding on which side the scale tips. I find the scales evenly balanced, but the court cannot leave
b them in everlasting equipoise because there would then be no proper law of the contract. But there is a proper law and that the court must impose on the contract, or extract from it, even if the operation is more like an adjustment than a reading of the scales.

Into the English scale the judge put the English nationality of the ship and of the shipowners, the place of business in Cardiff of their agents who negotiated the charterparty by telephone and telex, the provision for payment of freight and for calculating c demurrage and dispatch in sterling and the English form and language of the charterparty. But he rightly gave little weight to the last two and disregarded the bill of lading.

Into the Dutch scale he put the place where the charterparty was signed, the nationality of the charterers, and the place of shipment. He rightly disregarded the d earlier charterparty and its Dutch ship for which this charterparty was substituted, but apparently treated the fact that everything after shipment up to port of discharge was to take place outside the Netherlands as more significant than the fact that it was to take place outside England also.

Into the English scale Lord Denning MR has put the consideration that the parties would not have put their signatures—or rather allowed one of them to put a signature on behalf of both of them—to a contract which was partly invalid. In Re Missouri
e *Steamship Co*⁹ Fry LJ asked:

'If you find in a contract, one of the parties to which is English, a stipulation which is valid according to the law of England, but not according to the law of the country where it is made, is not that evidence that the parties intended to f contract according to English law?'

Counsel conceded that it was some evidence and in their judgments Lord Halsbury LC and Fry LJ indicated that they thought it respectively 'irresistible' and 'cogent' evidence.

I appreciate that this is a consideration which only has weight if intention, however artificially, comes into the ascertainment of the proper law. But if it does, there must g go into the Dutch scale a counterbalancing consideration that the Dutch charterers are not lightly to have imputed to them, abetted by the other party, an intention to transgress the commercial code of their country, which their country's law forbids them to do by choosing the law of another country.

Bearing in mind all these matters, I confess that if I had to read the balance without assistance I should have been inclined to decide, by perhaps underestimating the power
h of the flag of the ship which it still has, that it tipped, if at all, in favour of Dutch law. But I am not willing to differ on such a nice and difficult point from the contrary view of Roskill J reached without the help from commercial arbitrators which the judge had in the Compagnie d'Armement Tunisienne SA case¹⁰ but endorsed by the other members of this court, particularly in a branch of the law where their experience so far exceeds my own.

j If the proper law of this contract is English and this court therefore has jurisdiction under RSC Ord 11, r 1 (1) (f) (iii) to make the order under appeal, why should it not be made? It is tempting to ask the question in that form when the contract by its terms makes English law its proper law but to reverse the approach where the contract does so by implication only and to ask: why should the order be made? Again it is tempting to say, as Farwell LJ indicated in *The Hagen*¹¹, that the court's discretion ought to be exercised only in plain cases to which the rule clearly applies but not in doubtful or borderline cases like the present.

However, I am satisfied that these temptations ought to be resisted; that the discretion given by the rule is unfettered except by comity, convenience and the justice of the case; and that the arguments elaborated by counsel for the charterers for reversing the judge's exercise of his discretion in favour of the shipowners must be rejected for the reasons given by the judge and by Lord Denning MR and Megaw LJ.

I agree therefore that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

a By s 1 of the Public Health Act 1936 it was the duty of a local authority to carry the Act into execution. Pursuant to that duty, and under the statutory authority contained in s 61 of the Act to make building byelaws, the Bognor Regis Urban District Council ('the council') made byelaws regulating (inter alia) the construction of buildings in their area. The Act provided the council with powers to enforce the byelaws. The byelaws were in standard form and could not be relaxed except with b the Minister's consent. The byelaws governed every stage of building work; in particular byelaw 18 provided that the foundations of a building should be properly constructed to sustain the loads of the building and to prevent any settlement that might impair its stability. The byelaws also provided for the appointment of surveyors and inspectors to visit building work to see whether the byelaws were being complied with. Offences against the byelaws were punishable by a fine. In 1958 a builder, H, c bought land in Bognor Regis for the purpose of developing it as a housing estate. He laid out the land in plots. One of the plots was on the site of an old rubbish tip, the tip having been filled in and the ground made up to look like the surrounding land. In October 1958 the builder submitted plans of this plot to the council for byelaw and planning approval. The plans showed that the house to be built on the plot had normal foundations for the type of soil in the area. In October 1958 the council
d gave byelaw approval to the plans, under the 1936 Act, on the printed form for that purpose. The form contained a note that all foundations and drains must be examined by the council's surveyor before being covered up, and that no new premises were to be occupied before being certified by the council's surveyor. A batch of notice forms was sent to the builder, with the form of approval, for him to notify the council of the progress of the work. Planning permission for development of the plot was then granted. Having got the necessary approvals, the builder started e work on the plot in 1959. While digging the trenches for the foundations he came on the remains of the rubbish tip; so he made the outer trench deeper than usual and reinforced the concrete floor with a steel mesh, but he did not bother about the inner walls. He duly notified the council that the foundations were ready for inspection. The council sent their building inspector to inspect them. The inspector approved the foundations for the purpose of the building byelaws. In doing so the f inspector failed to carry out his task properly for had he made a competent inspection of the foundations he could easily have detected that the house was being built on a rubbish tip and that, in breach of the byelaws, the foundations laid by the builder were not properly constructed having regard to the nature of the land since they were not strong enough to take the load of the house. Having obtained approval for the foundations, the builder went ahead in building up the house to damp-proof
g course level, and the work at that stage too was passed by the council's surveyor. The house was finished at the end of 1959, and early in 1960 the builder sold it to C. In December 1960 C sold the house to the plaintiff. As the house was new the plaintiff did not herself employ a surveyor but it was common ground that if a surveyor had been employed he could not have found out about the hidden defect in the foundations. The surveyor of the plaintiff's building society passed the house.
h Soon after the plaintiff had moved into the house in January 1961, the walls and ceiling cracked, the staircase slipped and the doors and windows would not close. This was due to subsidence of an internal wall caused by the inadequate foundations. The condition of the house got worse and in 1963 a surveyor instructed by the plaintiff's solicitor found out that the house had been built on a rubbish tip. In 1964 the plaintiff
j issued a writ against the builder and against the council for negligence claiming damages of £2,740 (being £2,240 for the cost of repairing the house and £500 for diminution in its value). The plaintiff's claim against the builder was settled for £625 because it was accepted that on the authorities^a he was exempt from liability for negligence.

^a I e Bottomley v Bannister [1932] KB 458 and Otto v Bolton & Norris [1936] 1 All ER 960

Held—(i) The council, through their building inspector, owed a duty of care to the plaintiff to ensure that the inspection of the foundations of the house was properly carried out and that the foundations were adequate, for the following reasons— a

(i) There was no basis for the contention that, since under the 1936 Act the council merely had a power to examine the foundations and therefore could not be held liable for failing to exercise that power, it followed that neither could they be held liable for failing to exercise the power with proper diligence; that contention could not be sustained because— b

(a) the effect taken together of the 1936 Act and the byelaws made thereunder by the council was to give the council control over building work and the way it was done (see p 470 e, p 477 g and p 485 d and g, post); (per Lord Denning MR and Sachs LJ) that control carried with it a duty to exercise their powers properly and with reasonable care; in particular the council were bound to take reasonable care to see that the byelaws were complied with and to appoint competent inspectors for the purpose (see p 470 f and h and p 485 j to p 485 a, post); c

(b) (per Sachs and Stamp LJJ) even if all that the council had was a 'mere power', they were nonetheless liable for the negligent exercise of that power as the negligence occurred in the course of a positive exercise of it; the assumption of control over building operations by the making of byelaws was a positive act and thereafter any negligence in the exercise of their control could give rise to liability; thus (per Sachs LJ) failure to inspect the foundations at all might according to the circumstances have constituted negligence; (per Stamp LJ) but for the failure to make a proper inspection the damage could not have occurred to the plaintiff; the situation could not be equated with one where an authority had failed to exercise their powers to prevent damage which would otherwise have occurred in any event (see p 480 b to d, p 486 d to f, p 488 a and b and p 490 g, post); Geddis v Bann Reservoir Proprietors (1878) 3 App Cas 430 applied; East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v Kent [1940] 4 All ER 527 distinguished. d

(ii) It could not be argued that, in view of the fact that the builder, as the owner of the property, could not be held liable under the principle in Donoghue v Stevenson^b, therefore the council could not be held liable for passing the builder's bad work because— e

(a) (per Lord Denning MR and Sachs LJ) the distinction between liability for chattels and liability for real property was unsustainable; the principles enunciated in Donoghue v Stevenson^b were applicable to an owner of realty; accordingly a builder who created a hidden defect was not absolved from liability merely because he was the owner of the premises which he had built (see p 471 g to p 472 a and e and p 479 c and d, post); dictum of Lord MacDermott in Gallagher v McDowell [1961] NI at 41 applied; Bottomley v Bannister [1932] 1 KB 458 not followed; Otto v Bolton & Norris [1936] 1 All ER 960 overruled; f

(b) (per Stamp LJ) there was no reason to acquit the council of negligence merely because the former owner or builder might not be made liable (see p 489 e and f, post). g

(iii) The building inspector owed a duty of care to the plaintiff as a professional adviser even though the plaintiff had not thought about and placed reliance on the inspector's conduct, because a professional man who gave advice on the safety of buildings, machines or material owed a duty to all those whom he knew, or ought to have known, might suffer injury if his advice were unsound (see p 473 d to g, p 482 b and c, and p 489 b and c, post); Clay v A J Crump & Sons Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 687 applied; Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575 distinguished; Robertson v Fleming (1861) 4 Macq 167 considered. h

(iv) The relationship between the building inspector and the plaintiff was sufficiently proximate to form the basis of a duty of care, although the plaintiff was only a subsequent purchaser, since any defect in the foundations once covered up could not possibly come to light as a result of an intermediate examination but only when the i

a damage appeared, therefore the inspector ought to have had the plaintiff in mind as someone likely to suffer damage if he was negligent in inspecting the foundations (see p 474 c, p 481 h to p 482 a and p 487 a to c, post).

(v) (per Lord Denning MR and Sachs LJ) As between the council and the plaintiff there existed a duty situation because—

(a) although the plaintiff's claim fell within the wide principle stated in Donoghue v Stevenson^c, that principle was not of universal application; it was a question of policy whether it should be applied to the novel claim for negligence made against the council; however, since the primary object of the legislation was to protect purchasers of houses from jerry building it followed that, unless there were countervailing reasons of policy which would lead to a contrary conclusion, the council, who could afford to bear the loss, should be held liable to purchasers for failure to carry out the responsibility which had been entrusted to them under the relevant legislation (see p 475 b c and g to p 476 a and p 478 a to c, post);

(b) there were no countervailing reasons why the council should not be held liable; as the builder would be liable for building the house badly there was nothing wrong in holding the council liable for passing the bad work and (per Sachs LJ) it was, in this category of case, particularly important that dual liability of the builder and council should exist; to impose liability on the council would not adversely affect the work of building inspection and to permit this new type of claim in negligence would not in practice lead to a flood of cases which neither the local authority nor the courts could handle (see p 476 b to f, p 483 h and j and p 484 a b d and j, post).

Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] All ER Rep 1 and dicta of Lord Pearson and Lord Diplock in Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] 2 All ER at 321, 325, 326 applied.

(2) The council were liable to the plaintiff for the damage caused by the breach of duty by their building inspector in failing to carry out a proper inspection of the foundations; the plaintiff was not precluded from recovering damages on the ground that her loss was solely economic because (per Lord Denning MR and Sachs LJ) the damage to the house was physical damage and the plaintiff was entitled to recover the cost of repairs: (per Sachs and Stamp LJ) as an action in negligence lay for economic or physical loss, the correct test in ascertaining whether any particular damage was recoverable was not whether it was physical or economic damage, but what range of damage was the proper exercise of the power designed to prevent or what was the character of the duty owed; applying that test there was nothing in the nature of the loss sustained by the plaintiff to preclude a claim being maintained for that loss; accordingly the plaintiff was entitled to recover the damages claimed against the council as representing the cost of repairing the house although (per Sachs LJ) it was doubtful whether damages could be awarded for any reduction in market value (see p 474 f, p 480 f to h, p 481 b to d, p 484 g and p 490 c to f, post).

Appeal

- This was an appeal by the second defendants, Bognor Regis Urban District Council ('the council'), from a judgment of Cusack J given on 7th April 1971, and reported at [1971] 2 All ER 1003, on the trial of an action by the plaintiff, Saidee Dutton, against f the second defendants for damages for the negligence of their building inspector in approving, for the purpose of the building byelaws, the foundations of a house built by the first defendants, Bognor Regis United Building Co Ltd, and subsequently purchased by the plaintiff. The trial judge awarded the plaintiff £2,115 damages with interest at 6 per cent from the date of the service of the writ against the second defendants. The plaintiff's action for negligence against the first defendant was g settled. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

Norman C Tapp QC and J J Davis for the council.

John K Wood QC, P S A Rosedale and Sarah Cockburn for the plaintiff.

Cur adv vult

- h 17th December. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR.

1. The facts

In Bognor Regis there was years ago a rubbish tip. It was filled in and the ground made up so that it looked like the land next to it. You would not have known there had ever been a rubbish tip there.

- j In 1958 a builder, Mr Holroyd (who called himself the United Building Co), bought all the land in that area and proposed to develop it as a housing estate. He called it the Gossamer Estate, and laid it out in roads and plots. One of the plots was on the site of the old rubbish tip. It was plot 28, St Richard's Way. Mr Holroyd employed a local surveyor—Mr Lewis—to make plans and apply for planning permission; and also, of course, for byelaw approval.

On 16th October 1958 Mr Holroyd's surveyor submitted the plans. It was quite a straightforward plan, showing the house with normal foundations for the type of soil usually found in Bognor Regis. On 23rd October 1958 the Bognor Regis Urban District Council gave byelaw approval in their printed form. Their engineer and surveyor sent formal approval to Mr Holroyd's surveyor:

'... I hereby give you notice that the plan(s) of proposed works, viz. Det. House & garage, situate in Plot 28, St. Richards Way for W. Holroyd Esq. which has been deposited by you in accordance with building byelaws with the local authority has been PASSED.

'The passing of the plan(s) operate(s) as an approval thereof only for the purposes of the requirements of the byelaws and of section(s) 37, 61, 63, 64 & 65 of the Public Health Act, 1936.

'Dated this 23rd. day of October, 1958.

E. B. Williams,

Engineer & Surveyor.

'NOTE: All foundations and drains must be first examined by the Surveyor before being covered up.

'No new premises to be occupied before being certified by the Surveyor. The accompanying Notice Forms are to be filled up and returned to the Surveyor as the works proceed, and when completed ...'

Together with that form, there were sent to Mr Holroyd's surveyor a batch of notice forms for him to notify the council's surveyor of the progress of the work. That byelaw approval was followed by planning permission. This was sent on 11th November 1958 by the clerk to the council to Mr Holroyd's surveyor. It said:

'... the Council, on behalf of the West Sussex County Council, hereby PERMIT the following development, that is to say:—Detached House and Garage, Plot 28, St. Richards Way, Gossamer Estate, Aldwick, for W. Holroyd Esq. in the terms of, and subject to compliance with, the details specified in plan and application ... submitted to the Council on 16th October, 1958 ...'
